Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, this bill gives to the Court of Claims jurisdiction to consider any amount of extra costs which may be found to be legally due and to make payment accordingly to the Virginia Engineering Co. for its work in the construction of the Veterans' Administration hospital at Aspinwall, Pa. It seems that after the contract was awarded certain labor troubles and other difficulties ensued whereby the cost of the building was increased. The Veterans' Administration urged the Virginia Engineering Co. to prosecute as rapidly as possible the construction of the building. This bill, I repeat, gives to the Court of Claims jurisdiction and authority to consider the case and to award any damages by way of extra cost that may be found to be due.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). The amendments having been agreed to, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

TAMPICO MARINE IRON WORKS

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 61) to repeal an act approved February 17, 1933, entitled "An act for the relief of Tampico Marine Iron Works", and to provide for the relief of William Saenger, chairman, liquidating committee of the Beaumont Export & Import Co., of Beaumont, Tex.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I observe that this joint resolution was introduced by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. I should like to have him make a statement to the Senate regarding the measure.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, a bill has heretofore been enacted for the relief of the Tampico Marine Iron Works, a Mexican concern, for work done on a United States Shipping Board vessel. The bill authorized payment to an American concern, the Beaumont (Tex.) Export & Import Co., a creditor of the Mexican concern, on presentation of proper authority from the latter to the Secretary of the Treasury. This authority was obtained, but was in some way misplaced, and when an attempt was made to secure a duplicate, it was found that the Tampico Marine Iron Works was no longer in existence. The purpose of this resolution is to repeal the bill above mentioned and to provide for payment to William Saenger, chairman of the liquidating committee of the Beaumont Export & Import Co., of Beaumont, Tex.

Mr. ROBINSON. The bill provides for payment to an individual rather than to a corporation?

Mr. SHEPPARD. To an individual who is the legal representative of the Beaumont Export & Import Co.

Mr. ROBINSON. The evidence establishes to the satisfaction of the Senator from Texas the right of Mr. Saenger to be awarded this money?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It does.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the act approved February 17, 1933, entitled "An act for the relief of Tampico Marine Iron Works", being Private Act No. 209, Seventy-second Congress, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to William Saenger, chairman, liquidating committee of the Beaumont Export & Import Co. for the Tampico Marine Iron Works, a foreign corporation, the sum of $1,500 in full settlement of all claims due the Tampico Marine Iron Works by the Government of the United States to work on, repairing, raising, and furnishing material for the United States Shipping Board vessel Latham, during the year 1920: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, not observing that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] is in the chair, I was about to ask for a brief statement regarding this matter. A considerable amount is involved in the bill—some $5,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair will be glad to state from the chair, if he may, that the bill is approved by the Treasury Department.

In constructing the building now occupied by the Department of Labor, in order to facilitate the progress of the work and go ahead with it, the stonework was set without putting in the cut forms. When the time arrived to put in the cut forms, it took additional stone and labor to the extent set out in the bill. The report from the Treasury Department says that by permitting the work to go ahead, setting the stone first and doing this other work afterward, the construction of the building was facilitated, and a considerable amount of money was saved for the Government.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time and passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the bill go over.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withhold his objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator desires, I will withdraw the objection until he can explain the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. I think it should be explained, briefly, for the reason that several years ago, when Mr. Ogden Mills was Secretary of the Treasury, an adverse report on this claim was made. The adverse report grew out of a misapprehension of the facts of the case.

Some years ago a bill was passed authorizing the construction of the Atlanta, Ga., post office at an up-set price, more than $2,000,000. Eight hundred and eighty thousand dollars was set aside for the purchase of the land. There were some 12 parcels of land at the site where the Government desired to locate the Federal building. The Government declined to enter into negotiations with the several owners, and insisted that they procure someone to represent all of the property owners.

The firm of J. H. Taylor & Son, a reputable firm of Atlanta, who had no interest in any of the land, was selected for that purpose. I speak from knowledge, because I was interested in the bill which led to the construction of the Atlanta post office.

Practically all the parcels of land were procured, by consent, at prices that were agreeable. Two tracts had to be condemned. One tract of land was secured under a friendly condemnation proceeding, or a proceeding practically friendly. Another tract had to be procured, both for the purpose of settling the title and eliminating questions of ownership, and because there was a failure to agree upon the price.

With reference to one of these tracts of land the condemnation proceedings were had, and the finding was against the property owner, but the property owner immediately filed an appeal. Taylor & Son were in constant communication with the Treasury Department. While the appeal was pending, it appeared that by bringing the award up to the original allotment made for the purchase of the land the title could be procured; that is, the appeal would be dismissed, and the district attorney, who had charge of the condemnation proceeding, was agreeable to that method of handling and closing the case.

It turned out, however, that for some reason Mr. Heath, who was then Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and who wished to proceed with the construction of the post office, desired that the titles be cleared at once, and Taylor was instructed to pay the difference between the award and the amount actually originally set aside for the purchase of the real estate.

According to Mr. Taylor's contention, and according to the contention of the district attorney, these are the true facts in the case. At any rate, the appeal was dismissed, Taylor paid the money out of his own pocket, and the Comptroller General conceived of the case as one that amounted simply to a transaction of a broker, and said that the Government had no authority to make that sort of contract.

The Department at Washington, as I recall the facts, after the long lapse of time, went so far as to advise Mr. Taylor that it had submitted a claim to the Comptroller for $3,500, which was the difference between the award and the price which the property owner had agreed to take and dismiss his appeal, and pending the determination of that claim by the Comptroller, Mr. Taylor paid the money out of his pocket, and then the Comptroller disallowed the claim.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is for a return of money which Taylor had actually paid out?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; for the return of money which Taylor actually paid. He had not one cent of interest in the property.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was not a brokerage transaction at all?

Mr. GEORGE. Not at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. But is for reimbursement of money actually paid out?

Mr. GEORGE. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

R. D. STEPHENS AND VERA STEPHENS

The bill (S. 3808) for the relief of R. D. Stephens and Vera Stephens was announced as next in order.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, that bill was introduced by me; and, of course, I am favorable to its passage. However, if any member of the committee is present, I wish to ask what it was that actuated the committee in cutting down the amount to the sum which the committee suggests should be allowed to the two persons who were injured by the admitted negligence of the driver of a Government-operated truck.

A jury in the Federal Court for the Western District of Wisconsin set the damages to the man at $2,250, and the damages to the wife at $5,000. The wife had her back broken and her nose crooked as the result of the accident, and her knee was badly hurt.

I desire to know if there was some reason why the committee made that rather considerable reduction in the amount of damages that should be awarded in this case.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, what is the number of the bill?

Mr. DUFFY. It is Senate bill 3808, Calendar No. 2027, at the bottom of page 31. The case was one where the driver of a Civilian Conservation Corps truck was admittedly negligent, and smashed into the claimants; and the jury, in the case brought against the driver to determine the amount of damages in the Federal court, awarded the amount which I incorporated in the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. The chairman of the committee is not here to make the explanation. Why not let it go over until the Senator can hear from him?

Mr. DUFFY. I believe it would be better to have the bill go over, because I really think there is no justification for the reduction in the amount of damages.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

WHITMAN NATIONAL MONUMENT

The bill (H. R. 7736) to provide for the establishment of the Whitman National Monument was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the author of the bill explain it?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, the bill provides that the Government may accept, as a part of its national monument program, a certain piece of property which is being donated by the people of the city of Walla Walla, Wash., in commemoration of Marcus Whitman. In 1836 Whitman went to the Pacific Northwest, and a centennial celebration of that event is now being held. In connection therewith, a donation of this land is being made for the establishment of the Whitman National Monument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with an amendment, on page 2, to strike out the last section, as follows:

SEC. 4. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

RUTH EDNA REAVIS (NOW HORSLEY)

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4374) for the relief of Ruth Edna Reavis (now Horsley), which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the statutory period of entry in the case of Buffalo, Wyo., 030423, Ruth Edna Reavis (now Horsley), is extended 2 years to permit the fulfillment of necessary residence and improvement requirements on the land.

AMENDMENT OF ENABLING ACT FOR ARIZONA

The bill (S. 4230) to amend section 28 of the Enabling Act for the State of Arizona, approved June 20, 1910, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 28 of the act entitled "An act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States", approved June 20, 1910, is amended (1) by striking out the proviso in the third paragraph thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent said State of Arizona from leasing in a manner as the State legislature may direct, any of said lands referred to in this section for grazing and agricultural purposes for a term of 10 years or less, or from leasing any of said lands for mineral purposes (including leases for exploration of oil and gas and extraction thereof) for a term of 20 years or less"; (2) by striking out in the fourth paragraph thereof "nor in any case less than the minimum price hereinafter fixed"; (3) by striking out in the fifth paragraph thereof "$3 per acre" and inserting in lieu thereof "their appraised value"; and (4) by inserting between the fifth and sixth paragraphs thereof the following new paragraph:

"The State of Arizona is authorized to exchange any lands owned by it for other lands, public or private, under such regulations as the legislature thereof may prescribe: Provided, That such exchanges involving public lands may be made only as authorized by acts of Congress and regulations thereunder."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the calendar.

Mr. HATCH and Mr. COPELAND rose.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, does the Senator from New York desire to bring a question before the Senate?

Mr. COPELAND. I have a privileged matter to bring before the Senate, the conference report on the Army appropriation bill.

THE WESTERN RANGE

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator is going to make some remarks, I will ask him if he will not let me first ask unanimous consent for the adoption of a resolution requesting certain information from the Department of Agriculture and to make a few remarks in connection with it.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, at the present time there is great interest all over the country in regard to flood control and all kindred subjects. Connected with that idea is the control of winds, which, together with floods, bring great destruction in the West. I wish to present a resolution which proposes to bring to the Senate some information which I think will be very valuable for use in considering that subject. The information I refer to is now in the possession of the Department of Agriculture.

Lying to the west of the one hundredth meridian is an area of more than 700,000,000 acres of range lands. Because of the low precipitation or rough topography, this immense area—nearly 40 percent of the total land area of the continental United States—cannot, except for relatively small tracts suitable for irrigation, be used for much else than livestock grazing or other range purposes.

Within this territory, however, more than three-fourths of a million farm and ranch units are operated, having a combined investment of nearly $13,000,000,000, of which about one-third is range. This range territory supports approximately 17,000,000 cattle and 29,000,000 sheep, or 28 percent of the cattle and 58 percent of the sheep of the entire United States. It supports nearly 7,000,000 persons, or about one-half the entire population of the West.

Water is the limiting factor in practically all western development. The water for irrigation, power, and municipal use comes largely from the range lands.

The use of the range is interwoven in the agricultural structure, and in fact the whole social and economic structure, of the great West.

Much of the range has been subject to heavy grazing since pioneer days. It is commonly reported that the resource has been seriously depleted over enormous areas, and that floods are increasing in number and destructiveness; and it is common knowledge that there have been serious land use and social and economic maladjustments which have had far-reaching consequences. Everyone is interested in trying to relieve the situation if it is possible for that to be done.

Although little appreciated, the range is in fact one of our great natural resources; and provision should be made for its conservation and wise use, not only in the control of the waters but in the control of the lands themselves for pasturage and range purposes. It should be of great value to Congress in its consideration of agricultural and conservation problems to have before it the fullest information now available. The purpose of my resolution is to obtain such information as the Department of Agriculture now has and such recommendations as the Secretary of Agriculture may make.

I understand that the Secretary of Agriculture has in the various bureaus of the Department of Agriculture a large fund of information which I think will be very valuable for our consideration in legislating upon this very important subject.

I therefore submit the resolution which I send to the desk, and after it shall have been read I shall ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 289) was read, as follows:

Whereas large parts of the western range have been subject to unrestricted use since settlement and are commonly believed to be more or less seriously depleted; and

Whereas the range resource constitutes one of the major sources of wealth to the Nation; and

Whereas the Department of Agriculture has through many years of research and of administration of the national forests accumulated a large amount of information on the original and present condition of the range resource, the factors which have led to the present condition, and the social and economic importance of the range and its conservation to the West and to the entire United States: Be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he hereby is, requested to transmit to the Senate at his earliest convenience a report incorporating this information, together with recommendations as to constructive measures.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I submit the conference report on the War Department appropriation bill and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

Amendment numbered 15: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert: "$3,103,527"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment amended to read as follows: "$26,887,384, and, in addition, $501,714 of the appropriation 'Pay of the Army, 1936', which shall remain available until June 30, 1937"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New York about some of the amendments. What was done in the conference in regard to Senate amendment numbered 46?

Mr. COPELAND. That amendment was approved in the conference; I am very glad it was; and the authorship of the amendment had much to do with the conclusion of the matter in conference.

Mr. President, let me say that, strange as it may seem, because it is so unusual, the appropriations contained in this bill as it is now written are $252,461 below the estimates. It is such an unusual thing to have this happen that I think it ought to be made a matter of record.

There are a few amendments which, under the rules of the House, must be voted upon by that body, but the conference was harmonious and we found ourselves in full agreement.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I recall that when the bill was before the Senate a very considerable increase was made in the appropriation for the improvement of rivers and harbors. May I ask the Senator what action was taken as a result of the conference?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senate added $50,000,000, and, besides that, it added $8,000,000 for certain projects which were contested here—the Sardis Dam in Mississippi, the Conchas Reservoir in New Mexico, and the Bluestone Reservoir in West Virginia. The conferees decided that the Bluestone Reservoir had no standing because it had not been approved by either House of Congress; but as to the other items, one involving two and a half million dollars and the other three and a half million dollars, one or the other of the Houses having approved the measures, they were eligible, and therefore the conferees decided that the $6,000,000 should be included in the bill.

Then we figured up and found we had some money left, so the conferees agreed to increase the river and harbor items over the bill as it came to the Senate from the House by $15,000,000. So the appropriations for river and harbor items under the bill as agreed to in conference will be $121,000,000 against the larger sum which we had hoped for here, but that particular item under the rules of the House must be approved by that body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

T. V. A. POWER RATES

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to an article which appeared in the Commercial Appeal of Memphis, Tenn., on the 22d instant, concerning T. V. A. power received in 450 rural homes. The article, being a dispatch from Jackson, Tenn., in part reads as follows:

Electric lights are burning in 450 west Tennessee homes tonight for the first time.

The first link in T. V. A.'s rural-electrification program for west Tennessee became "hot" with power from Wilson Dam at 9:30 o'clock this morning. The power was relayed via the Corinth, Miss., substation.

At Enville, home of Glenn Hassell, president of the Pickwick Electric Membership Corporation, recently established to distribute T. V. A. power in rural areas, Mr. Hassell said that "We are especially glad to be on the first T. V. A. link for west Tennessee."

Then the article refers to a number of towns which are to be served in that district, and states:

The minimum charge for the first 25 kilowatts will be $1. Each kilowatt thereafter will cost 3 cents.

Mr. President, what a tremendous reduction that represents from the prevailing rates for power throughout the country! I feel that this statement ought to be made and that the country ought to know what a wonderful work is being done by the T. V. A.

I ask that the entire article to which I have referred may be printed at this point in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Memphis (Tenn.) Commercial Appeal of Apr. 22, 1936]

T. V. A. POWER RECEIVED IN 450 RURAL HOMES—RURAL ELECTRIFICATION BENEFITS GO INTO SMALL TOWNS—KEROSENE LAMPS GO OUT—FIRST LINK IN WEST TENNESSEE REACHES MANY SETTLEMENTS—MINIMUM CHARGE IS $1 FOR 25 KILOWATTS

JACKSON, TENN., April 21.—Electric lights are burning in 450 west Tennessee homes tonight for the first time.

The first link in T. V. A.'s rural electrification program for west Tennessee became "hot" with power from Wilson Dam at 9:30 o'clock this morning. The power was relayed via the Corinth, Miss., substation.

At Enville, home of Glenn Hassell, president of the Pickwick Electric Membership Corporation, recently established to distribute T. V. A. power in rural areas, Mr. Hassell said that "We are especially glad to be on the first T. V. A. link for west Tennessee."

TOWNS ON ROUTE

Besides Enville, among other towns on the 70-mile line, are Leapwood, Milledgeville, Morris Chapel, Chewella, Ramer, and Finger. Farm homes in McNairy, Chester, and Hardin Counties are discarding kerosene lamps.

Although this is the first link for west Tennessee, these towns are not the first to receive T. V. A. power in the district.

Stantonville, Guy, and Michie have been receiving T. V. A. power from the Alcorn County, Miss., Electric Power Association.

In addition to the line opened today the Pickwick corporation will take over the 26 miles of west Tennessee lines from the Alcorn corporation.

The minimum charge for the first 25 kilowatts will be $1. Each kilowatt thereafter will cost 3 cents.

Meanwhile the T. V. A. line to Jackson and other west Tennessee cities is moving forward rapidly. Nine carloads of equipment have arrived at Bemis for the work. The line is expected to be completed by July 15.

W. P. A. ACTIVITIES IN NEW MEXICO

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I wish to take but a few minutes on the subject of boondoggling. Something has been said in this Chamber and much has been written in the newspapers on the subject of boondoggling. In some of the articles which have appeared in the newspapers of the country statements have been made about the State of New Mexico. I would that I had the time and the accurate information to give the Senate about the projects which have been approved and the work which is being done in my State. I shall not attempt to do that today, but to one particular town and county I desire to refer because of an editorial which appeared in the New York Sun under date of March 11, 1936.

The information which I wish to give to the Senate is contained in a newspaper article from the Clayton (N. Mex.) News under date of April 8, 1936.

I quote first the New York Sun editorial:

Among New Mexico's more important cities there is Clayton, population 2,512. It is served by two railroads, has an express agency, a post office, a bank, a telegraph station, and even an airport. It is also the focal point at which a number of excellent highways converge. A main national highway links it to the East and the West; two all-weather, gravel-surfaced roads connect it with towns to the north, the south, and southwest, while a dirt road provides the communication with the outlying villages of the mountainous hinterland to the northwest.

Yet President Roosevelt has approved the following W. P. A. projects for Clayton—

I call attention to the statement of the items which the President is said to have approved for projects in Clayton. The editorial continues:

Construct farm-to-market road, $121,408; construct farm-to-market road to Hayden (a road linking Hayden and Clayton already exists), $16,337; construct road, $42,218; construct farm-to-market road, $26,788; improve three farm-to-market roads, $142,354; improve roadway and move fence, $26,486; improve State road no. 58, $29,453; improve streets, $15,783; construct culverts, spillways, and drains, $20,629; move bridge, $6,753; replace water service lines, $24,890; improve distribution system, $24,937; improve park, $1,050; construct five school buildings, $12,252; and construct community center, $12,555.

The total authorized expenditure is $522,893, or $209 per inhabitant——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAVEZ in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HATCH. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator still reading from the New York Sun editorial?

Mr. HATCH. Yes; I am reading from the editorial which appeared in the New York Sun and which concluded as follows:

The total authorized expenditure is $522,893, or $209 per inhabitant. The question arises how the citizens of this little metropolis managed to eke out an existence prior to the advent of Harry Hopkins and the adoption of boondoggling as a national pastime.

Mr. President, in fairness to the writer of the editorial I should say that it does not make the statement that this money has actually been expended. It does infer, however, that all these projects have been approved and this vast sum of money, amounting to $209 per inhabitant of the town of Clayton, is being spent today.

First, I desire to call attention to the fact that Clayton itself is the county seat of Union County. It is more than 100 miles to the next county seat to the west—Raton. It is something like 75 miles to the next county seat to the south. Clayton is in the northeast corner of New Mexico, in the midst of what has been termed the "dust bowl" area, a section which has suffered the most severe drought for the last 3 years of any section of the country unless it be the county of Las Animas, in Colorado, just across the line in Colorado. I see the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] is present and honoring me with his attention.

The implication of this editorial is that all this money has been spent in the "little village of Clayton", as it is termed. I want to show just exactly what has been done under these projects and just what they mean. I now quote from the News, a newspaper published at Clayton, N. Mex.:

Now let us take up each project mentioned in turn.

Construction, farm-to-market roads, $121,408.

That was the statement in the Sun editorial.

This road makes possible a saving of about 75 miles to the residents of that section of the county going and coming to Des Moines.

That saving is made not alone to the city of Clayton but to that entire area, a saving of 75 miles of distance going and coming, and not even to Clayton but to Des Moines, another town in the county.

It is a hard-surfaced, all-weather road, a needed and permanent improvement, and the money allotted was only $12,372.

Instead of being $121,000 as stated in the New York Sun editorial, the amount of the Presidential approval and the actual cash allotted was $12,372. That was the enormous sum allotted to be spent on that highway.

The news article continues:

The Hayden Road, $16,337.

That is the figure according to the Sun editorial.

This road connects one of the better agricultural sections with State Road 18 and serves a large community; another needed and lasting project, with money allowed amounting to $2,687.43.

In other words, the money actually allotted was not $16,337, as stated in the Sun editorial, but was $2,687.

The news item continues:

Highway 18 at Amistad, $42,218. This construction is a link in the north-to-south main highway, one of the important State highways, and a continuation of work started some 3 years ago. It consists of grading and caliche surfacing, and there was allotted $17,218.

There was allotted $17,218, and not $42,218, as stated by the New York Sun.

Improve roadway, $26,788. A main artery of travel serving a large farming and ranching section near Grenville on State road 120. The money allotted was $16,788.

Not at Clayton at all, but near Grenville, N. Mex., in another part of the county on State Road 120. The money actually allotted was not $26,788, as stated in the Sun editorial, but was $16,788.

Three farm-to-market roads, $142,354. One of these projects is east of Grenville on State Road 120 and is a continuation of work started that had to be stopped for lack of funds.

By the way, I do not believe as yet a single one of these projects is located in the city of Clayton.

Another is a road from Perico to Highway 58 to serve a farming community, but as no money was allotted no work has ever been done. The last one is the road from Des Moines to Guy, but like the second project no money has been allotted and no work done. On the one allotment the amount was $6,800.

Improve roadway, $26,486.

That is one of those terrible boondoggling projects. The facts are that the project has not as yet been started and not a single cent has been allotted to that project.

Improve roadway, $26,486. This project has never been started because no funds were allotted for it.

Improvement on State Road 58, $29,453. This is our connecting road with the State capital, with heavy travel, an important link in our highway system and a continuation of improvements that were started and unfinished 4 years ago. The amount allotted was only $17,453.

Improvement to streets, $15,793.

This was in the city of Clayton.

Improvement to streets, $15,783. This project hard-surfaces about 3 miles of Clayton streets, a project that was badly needed but one that the city did not or would not have the funds to do. The full amount was allotted. One of the best W. P. A. projects in the county.

Construction of culverts and spillways, $20,629. It makes an almost impassable highway passable for the farmers and ranchers living north of Clayton.

The allotment, however, is not $20,000; it is only $12,629.

Moving bridge, $6,753. This bridge spans the Carrizozo on State Highway 18 to Kenton.

Another community in the county.

Floodwater took it out 2 years ago, and trucks hauling alfalfa from the Cimarron Valley to Clayton could not travel the detour through the creek, and as a result had to detour through Boise City, Okla., or through Folsom, making an additional 50-mile haul getting to market.

The sum of $6,753 has been spent to save that 50-mile additional haul to the farmers in the Cimarron Valley, not in the city of Clayton.

Replace water service, $24,890. This—is one of the best W. P. A. projects in the State, if not in the United States. The town was losing about 40 percent of the water pumped due to old wooden mains put in service 15 years ago, and did not have the money to replace them. This project, now more than 70 percent complete, will save that loss, save pumping costs, and insure Clayton a water supply.

According to the Clayton newspaper—

The allotment, however, is not $24,890, but the actual sum allotted is $18,973.

Improve distribution system, $24,937.

This is a continuation of the water project to which I have referred, but the allotted money was $18,890, not $24,937.

Improve park, $1,050.

It is a terrible thing, I suppose, that the residents of Clayton, N. Mex., might desire a city park, and might expend thereon the mighty, tremendous sum of $1,050. That money was spent for the improvement of the city park in Clayton, providing a better system of drainage, and throwing the surplus water to the trees of the park. Those who have never lived in the arid regions of the West perhaps may not appreciate or understand what throwing excess water supply to trees and the cultivation and growing of trees means to a city such as Clayton, in northeastern New Mexico.

Construction of school buildings, $12,252.

We are censured for having constructed school buildings in Clayton, N. Mex.—this town which the New York Sun says has a population of 2,500—and, therefore, I presume it is wrong to build a school building in Clayton, N. Mex. However, the facts do not point that way. The school buildings were not even built in Clayton. The sum provided included necessary repairs to school buildings at Capulin, Hayden, Mount Dora, and Otto, other villages and communities in Union County. Several of these four school buildings, with a total enrollment of 258 pupils, were in such condition that their use for classrooms could not have been continued longer if the money had not been spent. The county did not have the money with which to make the necessary repairs. All of that money—$12,252—has been used, Mr. President, in this wasteful and extravagant manner of repairing school buildings in four rural communities in Union County, N. Mex. It may be waste and extravagance, but I say that the Works Progress Administration is to be complimented and commended for spending $12,000 for such a useful and worth-while purpose.

Community center, $12,555.

This project was to be used as a high-school gymnasium and community center for rural-school athletic tournaments; but the money was not allotted, and the work was never started. Yet, Mr. President, that sum is included in an editorial in the New York Sun as having been spent for "boondoggling", and is instanced as a waste of Federal funds. My only regret is that the money was not allotted, and it has not been spent. I think tomorrow morning I shall go to see Mr. Hopkins and see if that $12,000 cannot still be allotted for the purpose of building a community center for rural-school athletic tournaments and a high-school gymnasium.

The Clayton newspaper goes on to say:

It will be seen that every project was one that will serve some community interest. For 3 years an unprecedented drought has existed in Union County. Strictly a farming and stock-raising district, lack of crops and grass has reduced a large majority of the farmers and stockmen to dire straits. More than 1,000 of them have worked on these W. P. A. projects, and from their small wages have managed to exist, waiting for the rains that will mean financial independence again. Had they not had employment on these projects, they could not have remained, but would have had to move on, leaving behind them a lifetime of effort. This fact was taken into consideration by the heads of the political subdivisions before they agreed to sponsor the projects.

The Sun is merely trying to make the citizens of the East believe that the citizens of the West, and Union County in particular, at least in this one editorial, are trying to profit at Government expense, when the truth is that the very projects they are deploring are not only worth while but are the only means of feeding more than a thousand families, suffering not from depression, but drought.

Another unfair thing is to arrive at the per-inhabitant cost by dividing the population of Clayton into the application cost, when it should be on a county-population and money-allotted basis. Our county has approximately 3,700 square miles, more than many of the eastern States. On that basis it is nearer $20 per inhabitant than $209, the figure at which the Sun so erroneously arrived.

That is, Mr. President, the newspaper article says that computing the money actually allotted to the population of the county, the great, tremendous sum which has been allowed to Union County in this extremely "wasteful and extravagant" effort of the Works Progress Administration has not been $209 per inhabitant, but in reality it will figure about $20 per inhabitant.

Continuing the newspaper article, it says:

We here in Union County are grateful to the W. P. A. They have made possible for us repairs to our roads, schoolhouses, and water-distribution systems, repairs we could not have thought of starting without their aid. The large majority of farmers have not harvested enough off their farms the last 3 years to pay taxes. When such a condition exists with the taxpayers it is reflected in public funds.

Workmen on projects have turned in a fair day's work for the wages they were paid. It may mean boondoggle to the Sun, but to Union County it means a small wage that will keep the children of the family from having to go supperless to bed; it means an opportunity to stay when there is no place to go.

Be fair, Mr. Editorial Writer for the Sun. We have the fighting spirit out here in the West. The depression that nearly floored you we brushed aside as of no consequence, but try fighting a drought; that takes real courage, and sometimes help. Do not begrudge the small aid the W. P. A. granted us, please.

Mr. President, I shall not add more to what has been said by the newspaper writer in Clayton, N. Mex. He has well and ably stated the case for Union County and the Works Progress Administration. We have no apologies to offer. The work has been done. The money allotted has been spent on projects which are worth while, and which will be of lasting benefit and improvement.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE STATE, JUSTICE, ETC., DEPARTMENTS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12098) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McKELLAR. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference requested by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. McKELLAR, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. HALE, and Mr. NYE conferees on the part of the Senate.

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, on April 20, in the course of his remarks, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] criticized some of the activities of the W. P. A. Among other things, he criticized the so-called Federal theater projects and introduced into the RECORD letters from some critics of those projects. The impression was created that that was a generally accepted criticism by those who were informed as to the activities of the W. P. A. with reference to the theater projects. The contrary is the fact.

I desire to read just two telegrams, and then ask that the other telegrams in relation to this project—and they are from persons who are in a position to know—be printed in the RECORD.

One telegram is from Mr. Frank Gillmore, who is the president of the Actors' Equity Association, an association of which nearly all the actors in the United States who have been interested in these projects are members. Mr. Gillmore says, referring to the letter which was placed in the RECORD on April 20:

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 24, 1936.

The Honorable ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senate:

In reference to a letter addressed to Senator COPELAND and maybe to others by a Mr. E. J. Blunkell, criticizing the administration of the Federal theater project, I wish to officially inform you that his views are those of a private individual and in no way represent the Actors' Equity Association; indeed, we indignantly repudiate his opinion. No one in our employ has the right to speak for the Actors' Equity except the council or its president. I request that this telegram be read to the Senate and be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Best wishes.

Yours respectfully,
FRANK GILLMORE,
President, Actors' Equity Association,
45 West Forty-seventh Street, New York City.

There is another telegram, from some veterans. It was alleged that the World War veterans are also critical of these projects. This telegram reads:

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 24, 1936.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Senate Office Building:

Undersigned veterans, World War, employed Federal theater, protest reading of Federal Theater Veterans League petition on Senate floor as untrue and not representative of veterans' viewpoint. Request you read this telegram into RECORD.

MORRIS WATSON.
PIERRE DE ROHAN.
ROSAMOND GILDER.

There is only one other telegram which I shall read, a message from Mr. Frank Crumit, who is the head of the Lambs' Club of New York. Mr. Crumit is today one of our most famed actors. He says:

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 18, 1936.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senator from New York, Washington, D. C.:

The Lambs, the largest and most important theatrical club in the world, wishes to endorse the Federal theatrical project and urge that it be continued on a national basis. We deplore the prospect of the abandonment of its activities at this time.

FRANK CRUMIT, Shepherd.

Mr. President, I ask that other telegrams I have received on this subject be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 24, 1936.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

On account of the wonderful work that the Federal theater project has been doing, we, the voters in your State ask you to bend every effort to continue the Federal theater project under Federal control after June 13.

TROUPERS' CLUB ASSOCIATION, INC.,
S. F. MANNING, Secretary.

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 18, 1936.

ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We understand that on July 1 the Works Progress Administration is to be turned over to the States. We strongly urge, indeed beg of you, to fight for a continuation of the Federal theater project now part of Works Progress Administration on a national basis. It is likely to pass out of existance if handled by the States, and the generous assistance which the Government has given to all those connected with the theater will be a thing of the past.

Yours respectfully,
FRANK GILLMORE,
President, Actors Equity Association.

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 21, 1936.

Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Washington, D. C.:

On behalf the members of this union and the many thousands of theatrical people who are dependent on the W. P. A. theatrical project for their actual physical existence I earnestly plead with you for the continuation of same on a national basis.

JOHN C. MCDOWELL,
Theatrical Protective Union No. 1.

ALBANY, N. Y., April 21, 1936.

Hon. ROBERT WAGNER,
Capitol:

Due to fact that Federal theater projects at present affords employment to several thousand of our members, we unanimously urge this movement be perpetuated.

WM. C. FOLEY,
Secretary, Motion Picture Operators Local 324.

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 22, 1936.

Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Children's Theatre Co. protest transfer of W. P. A. art projects from Federal to State administration. Such change inimical to our well being as professional workers and menace to existence of American stage. We demand continuance of all W. P. A. projects and expansion of Federal theater into a permanent national theater.

MRS. FRANK LOMBARDO,
River Street, Paterson, N. J.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., April 23, 1936.

Senator ROBERT WAGNER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:
Urge you to use your influence to keep Federal theater project under control of present set-up at Washington with Mrs. Flanagan, and not to turn it over to State or city of New York. Project is doing splendid work. Any change of administration would certainly ruin everything. I speak from complete knowledge of the situation. I have no personal connection with the project and appeal only as playgoer, teacher, dramatic critic.

S. M. TUCKER,
Professor, Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn.

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 23, 1936.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.:
We, the constituents of your State, expect you to oppose the transfer of the four Federal arts projects to State control, believing the change to be detrimental to our interests. This change would hamper and curtail these projects and reduce them from present high state of efficiency and worth.

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 23, 1936.

Hon. ROBERT WAGNER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:
I urge continuation of the National Federal theater project after June 30 under direct Federal supervision. Project is of great credit to the American theater. Broadway can well learn a lesson from some of the Federal theater hits.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, APRIL 24, 1936

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father of everlasting love, we thank Thee for the merciful privilege of coming to Thee in prayer. May it be in the spirit of Him who taught us to say, "Our Father." We beseech Thee that His presence may come mightily upon us to strengthen, encourage, and guide us that we may attain the service we have pledged our country. Do Thou guard us in our contact with our fellow men, lest we be unmindful of the admonition, "Judge not that ye be not judged, for with what judgment ye judge, it shall be measured to you again." Heavenly Father, help us to heed the injunction, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." Once more in the dispensation of Thy providence our hearts are bowed; another Member has left us. The angel of death has borne him to a higher service. Comfort, we beseech Thee, all members of his fireside; may they go forward with strong faith and quickened hopes to the larger life that awaits the children of God. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LET'S FACE THE TAX PROBLEM

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following addresses delivered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] before the Town Hall, New York, on April 23:

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. FRANK H. BUCK, OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. Moderator, ladies and gentlemen of the Town Hall, taxation must always be faced. Civilized nations having come to the conclusion that governments must exist for the protection of property, life, and the well-being of the people, realize that governmental functions which are called into existence must be paid for. They must be paid for in the form of taxes, but new taxes are always objected to, and changes in tax rates made necessary by changing conditions, including increasing governmental activities demanded by the people themselves, are always the object of criticism. Present tax consciousness, so far as the Federal Government is concerned, has arisen from certain events that have taken place since January 1936.

In his Budget message of January 3, 1936, the President stated that the increase in revenues, then evident, would ultimately meet and pass the declining cost of relief, outside of which, for the general expenses of the Government, sufficient income was already available. Legislation involving new expenditures, he warned, would require new taxation. Since that message was sent to Congress, the decision of the Supreme Court invalidated the processing taxes levied under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which had been included as income in the 1936 and 1937 budgets, and Congress notwithstanding decided to make full payment of the benefits which had accrued to farmers under existing agricultural-adjustment contracts. These two decisions imposed the necessity of raising an additional $517,000,000, to be spread over 3 years.

The other two events are the enactment by Congress of the Soil Conservation Act, which, when carried out fully, will require a permanent annual Treasury income of $500,000,000; and the passage of the Adjusted Compensation Payment Act, which will add an annual charge of $120,000,000 for the next 9 years.

We are, therefore, concerned not with theory but with the very practical consideration of raising these sums of money in an equitable fashion.

It is the privilege of the taxpayer to have tax laws strictly construed. It is equally the duty of those delegated to secure revenue to see that all loopholes in them are closed. This the pending tax bill proposes to do, and in doing so, places all taxpayers on an equal basis.

People do not object to taxation to pay for what they have demanded in the way of governmental service if they consider the basis of taxation is fair. The proposals for permanent legislation in the pending tax bill, which are all my time permits me to discuss, do promote the principle of equity in our tax system. The major purposes of the revised corporation tax are to prevent the avoidance of surtaxes by individual shareholders; to remove the inequalities now existing between corporations, partnerships, and individuals; and to remove similar inequalities between large and small stockholders in the same corporation.

Simplification of the tax structure will also be accomplished by the repeal of the present capital-stock tax after the end of the current fiscal year, and the repeal of the present excess-profits tax, thus leaving simply one tax on corporations. Generally speaking, the bill proposes to repeal the present graduated tax on corporate income, and to provide a graduated scale of taxation on adjusted net income based upon the proportion which may be retained by the corporation. The rate of tax will depend upon the ratio of the undistributed net income to the adjusted net income. But corporations with not more than $10,000 net income may retain up to 40 percent of it and still pay a less tax than they do now to the Government. Corporations with more than that amount of income may retain around 30 percent of the year's earnings and profits and still pay no more tax than they do now. In 3 years, therefore, at the most, any corporation can increase its surplus by as much as 100 percent of a year's income and pay no more tax than it does today. You must remember that there is no tax to be levied on existing surpluses; that there is consideration to be given and adjustments in tax rates made for income used to pay off existing debts; that a corporation which pays out all of its adjusted net income in dividends will pay no tax where it is taxed now from 12½ to 15 percent on its entire net income.

Of course, the corporation actually will not be the sufferer. It is the individual who holds a large amount of stock in some profitable corporation and who now, through that corporation's failure to declare dividends, is escaping surtaxes, who is behind the protest against this principle of taxation. He does not want to consider existing tax inequalities.

What is a corporation? It is a fiction of law, a legal entity created and recognized solely by law, and therefore it is subject to the law entirely. It is entitled to no special privilege. Corporation earnings which are not currently distributed in dividends now escape surtaxes either for long periods or altogether. But if you and I are in a partnership, the law says that even if we do not draw our share of the partnership's earnings we must pay a tax on those undivided profits as if we had received them; and if as an individual I am in business, of course, I must pay a tax on my entire net earnings. Corporations by and large do not exist for the purpose of evading taxes. There are many other great advantages which the corporate form of structure enjoys—limited liability, among others—but there have been corporations and there are still those today who abuse their corporate privileges. Let us remember how in the stock-market days of 1928 and 1929 corporations with huge undistributed surpluses lent their money out at "call rates" for speculation. Thus they contributed in no small measure to the resulting stock-market crash. Except where used in this undesirable form, these unreasonable accumulations of surpluses are idle money. If, under undue optimism, directors and managers use them for unwarranted overexpansion of plant or production facilities, they accumulate as invested capital to a point where income on the investment can no longer be earned.

If, on the other hand, these surpluses are put into circulation in the form of dividends, individual shareholders will receive what is their just due and the Government revenues will be enlarged accordingly. All business income—corporate, partnership, or individual—will be placed upon the same basis. It has been suggested that with the prospect of such increased taxation large investors will seek tax-exempt bonds for their holdings, but if they sell present holdings, they must pay the capital gains tax, and thereafter dividends from such holdings will be taxable in the hands of those who invest. Moreover, it must be remembered that the field of tax-exempt securities is pretty well occupied and the yield is uncommonly small. Instead of reducing capital investments, the procedure under this bill will actually increase them. Large shareholders, or their successors in interest, now conserving their corporate income in corporate treasuries, and so evading or reducing individual taxes, as the recipients of dividends will be under the necessity of reinvesting their receipts and putting this money to work in new productive enterprises.

It has been argued that this tax bill will destroy the small corporation. This is absolute nonsense. The huge surpluses which large corporations now pile up enable them to destroy small competitors and to force them out of business. Small corporations will still expand at an even pace and on more favorable terms through the payment of less taxes. Finally, whatever the decisions of corporate managements—and the bill does not attempt to dictate what those shall be—in respect to declaration of dividends, the Federal Government will no longer be unreasonably and inequitably deprived of necessary revenues. The proposed plan will attain the essential objects of an excess-profits tax without the administrative difficulties and with more revenue to the Government. Estimates show the pending bill will accomplish the required financial objective.

Although, as I have shown, additional revenues are absolutely necessary now, it is argued that as an alternative expenditures should be reduced. For the future, with the restoration of business activities, with increasing prosperity now evident throughout the Nation, gradual reduction of Federal relief expenditures is possible and, in fact, is now taking place.

Increased expenditures for the regularly established civil departments of the Government have been made necessary largely by the long-continued neglect of these departments under recent preceding administrations. For example, the Navy and War Departments: The proposed budget for national defense for the fiscal year 1937 shows an increase of over $400,000,000 over that for 1935, and that showed an increase over earlier budgets. Both arms of the Nation's defense were so neglected by Republican administrations that it has become necessary now to make these vast appropriations to put our country in a state of anything like adequate defense. Is it these expenditures that it is proposed to reduce in order to avoid the necessity of further taxation? Is it the expenditures on behalf of agriculture, which are essential to offset, in some degree, the high costs that farmers bear as a result of the subsidies paid industrial tariff barons? Is it proposed to abolish the Civilian Conservation Corps, so definitely approved by the country? Just what do they propose to cut off? How much, and where?

What revenues the Government will ultimately require must, of course, depend upon what the people demand in the way of service. It may be with the increasing encroachment of States on Federal fields of taxation, and vice versa, that it will be necessary to rewrite the entire tax system, both Federal and State. As long, however, as the income tax remains one of the principal sources of revenue of the Federal Government it is our duty to see that that income tax be distributed as equitably as possible, and that no one be permitted to escape payment of his just proportion by resorting to a corporate fiction or any other device which prevents earnings and profits freely flowing into general circulation for the increase and promotion of the general prosperity.

ADDRESS OF HON. ALLEN T. TREADWAY, OF MASSACHUSETTS

It is gratifying to speak at the town meeting of the air, as for nearly 40 years I have been moderator at the regular old-fashioned town meeting in my home town of Stockbridge, Mass.

Taxes are the keystone of the arch of government, for without revenue, governments cannot exist. Taxes are as old as government itself. One of our first manifestations as a Nation was the Boston Tea Party, where our ancestors protested against taxation without representation. Taxes are a necessary evil, and no one escapes their burden; hence the expression, "As certain as death and taxes."

We have three forms of taxation, namely, Federal, State, and municipal. I shall deal only with the first of these. There are direct and indirect taxes. Direct taxation is levied specifically by government through legislative enactment. Indirect taxation is the increased prices the people pay for articles on which the producers have paid a direct tax.

I came here directly from the halls of Congress, where today and for several succeeding days a new tax measure will be discussed. Therefore, the subject under discussion tonight, Let's Face the Tax Problem, is certainly up to the minute.

It goes without saying that every cent which the Federal Government spends must at some time and in some way be collected from the people in the form of taxes. Hence, every citizen has a vital interest not only in the total amount of Federal expenditures but in whether these expenditures are being made wisely, economically, and prudently, or whether the money is spent unnecessarily, wastefully, and extravagantly.

In spite of the numerous and burdensome taxes now imposed by the Federal Government, its revenues are only sufficient to meet half its expenditures. In other words, it is spending two dollars for every dollar it collects. This dangerous and unsound practice of running the Government on borrowed money will have resulted in increasing the public debt to the unprecedented total of over thirty-four thousand millions of dollars by the close of this fiscal year, June 30, and the end is not yet in sight. This debt represents a tax burden which present and future generations will have to pay in addition to the amount necessary to cover the running expenses of the Government.

It is generally conceded that the present policy of borrowing to meet continued deficits must be changed if the Federal credit is to be preserved. Three years ago President Roosevelt said that this policy was leading the country into bankruptcy. At this time we are 3 years closer to that condition and are traveling at a faster pace.

There are three ways by which the Nation's credit can be saved:

First. By the imposition of sufficient new taxes to balance the Budget.

Second. By the reduction of expenditures to meet existing revenues.

Third. By a combination of increased taxes and reduced expenditures.

Which course shall we follow?

Before attempting to answer this question, let us analyze the present financial situation. We find that expenditures have increased from five and a third billions in 1933 to about eight billions in the present fiscal year. They will be even greater next year. I call particular attention to the fact that this increase is not wholly due to emergency outlays, but is in part caused by larger appropriations for permanent governmental functions.

While this deficit has been piling up Federal taxes have been increased several times, but collections have lagged far behind the increase in expenditures. Estimated receipts for the current year are three billion nine hundred million, as compared with one billion six hundred million in 1933. Our Budget-balancing efforts have been very much like a dog chasing its own tail.

Not only is it a hopeless task to try to balance the Budget until expenditures have been curtailed, but I am certain that business and the people cannot stand the burden of taxation necessary to meet present expenditures. We would have to raise about four thousand millions of new money, and it would have to come out of the pockets of the great masses of our people—those with small and moderate means. The rich were "soaked" to the point of confiscation by last year's tax bill, and even after that was done it was found that only two hundred and fifty million could be squeezed out of them in addition to what they were already paying. Not only would the present personal exemptions have to be reduced to a minimum—say $500 and $750 for single and married people, respectively—but the rates would have to be made extremely high for the small taxpayers. Even this would be insufficient. A substantial sales tax would have to be imposed, taxing not only luxuries but actual necessities of life as well. In addition numerous other burdensome tax measures would have to be resorted to. This is not a very pleasant picture to contemplate, but it is true.

The reason the Budget has not been balanced by this method is that it is "politically inexpedient" to do so. The administration has found it popular to play the role of Santa Claus, and it knows what would happen if it tried to collect the whole bill.

The country never would have stood for the profligacy of the present administration as long as it has if the people were more tax conscious. At the present time only 2,700,000 persons out of the entire population pay Federal income taxes. While the rest contribute their full share of the indirect taxes, these are levied in such a way as not to bring them forcibly to the attention of the taxpayers.

If Government expenditures were reduced to a reasonable minimum, a large part of the present and future tax burden could be avoided. It is even possible that with improved business conditions the present taxes would carry the load, and it is certain that nothing would contribute as much to business improvement and to the restoration of confidence as a radical reduction in expenditures and the elimination of extravagance and waste. It is not giving the taxpayers a square deal to keep on piling up more and more taxes simply to be squandered by the administration's spendthrifts.

I am opposed to the levying of new taxes until it can be determined to what extent expenditures can be curtailed without impairing any of the ordinary functions of Government, and without denying relief to the needy. This is one of the reasons why I am opposed to the bill now pending in Congress, which seeks to raise several hundred millions of additional taxes. Let us first reduce expenditures, and then, if necessary, impose what taxes are needed to put the Government on a sound financial basis.

Let me devote the remainder of my time to a brief reference to the new tax bill. It is difficult to talk on Thursday night about a bill of more than 200 pages which was not in existence until Wednesday morning. It has been prepared in response to the President's message of March 3. Its main feature is a proposal to substitute in place of the existing corporate taxes, a tax based wholly on undistributed earnings, graduated up to 42½ percent. The purpose of the tax is to force a distribution of earnings. In effect, it penalizes amounts set aside for protective reserves, amounts used for rehabilitation and expansion, and amounts set aside for the payment of debts. It punishes business prudence, and encourages improvident management. It will impair the financial structure of business, threaten the security of investments, and result in a restriction of corporate credit. It will benefit the strong company and crush the weak, and will be conducive to monopoly. It will tax one company at a high rate and another at a low rate on the same amount of income. In some instances it will even tax a small income at a higher rate than a larger income. It will create unfair competitive conditions as between different companies. I could mention many other objections.

The business people of the country, both individually and through their organizations, have shown bitter opposition to the measure. Their main objection is that it will prevent the accumulation of "rainy day" reserves, which are so necessary to business stability and the maintenance of employment and dividend payments.

Experience during the depression has amply demonstrated the importance and value of such reserves, and it is impossible to estimate how much worse conditions might have been had business not been able to build up reserves in times of prosperity to tide over periods of adversity. Reserves are also of great benefit in such unforeseen contingencies as the recent floods in New England and Pennsylvania and the hurricanes in the South.

The Department of Commerce estimates that in the 5-year period commencing with 1930, business paid out over twenty-six and a half billions more than the amount of income received. In a sense, this represents the contribution made by business out of its reserves for recovery and relief purposes.

If the tax policy proposed by the pending bill had been in effect prior to 1929, business never could have accumulated these reserves. As it was, these reserve funds saved thousands of concerns from bankruptcy, provided employment for millions of men, and assured dividends to large numbers of stockholders at a time when they were most needed.

The policy underlying the bill can only serve to undermine the whole business structure. It will accentuate the peaks of boom periods and intensify the adversity of hard times. It is another example of the work of impractical theorists rather than being based on practical business experience, which should be the criterion of sound legislation.

The underlying principle in the bill is contrary in every particular to business development. Instead of a breathing spell, as promised us by the President, business is getting more and more out of breath. If ever there was need of a breathing spell, now is the time.

To frame a tax bill based on erroneous theories to pay for extravagances and wastefulness is a violation of the authority vested in us by the people. Let me therefore conclude by saying I heartily believe in proper relief to the needy and advocate its management and distribution through State agencies rather than through regimentation and bureaucracy in Washington. I thoroughly believe in ample appropriations to meet all rightful needs of government. I am definitely committed to the program of no new taxation until it has been definitely proven that all waste and extravagance have been eliminated. The method which has been followed in proposing, preparing, and submitting this measure to Congress very definitely illustrates the dictatorial and autocratic powers which this administration has continuously exercised.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days after the passage of the tax bill in which to extend their own remarks in the RECORD on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

THE REVENUE BILL OF 1936

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12395) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12395, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 35 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, some time ago millions of loyal men and women heard with inexpressible shame a Cabinet member of this Administration characterize the Supreme Court decision in the A. A. A. case as "the greatest legalized steal in history."

Others who regard our form of government with contempt absorbed this un-American poison with relish and avidity. Those with hatred in their hearts for free government, who rebel against orderly government, and long to destroy it and then replace it with mob rule, rejoiced to hear a high official condemn the Supreme Court.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BIERMANN. Is it proper for a Member of this House to accuse a member of the Cabinet of holding the Supreme Court of the United States in contempt?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that is a proper parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] will proceed in order, of course.

Mr. REED of New York. Leadership in government that points the finger of scorn and contempt at the tribunal that has performed its sworn duty under the Constitution will never direct the thoughts of a people along those lines that make for liberty and freedom. Under such leadership this Nation can never attain to that exalted destiny which Washington envisioned for the United States of America.

It is easy to agitate the hopes and fears of the people in the time of distress. It is not difficult to sway society by an appeal to prejudice and passion. To array class against class and then through the arts of demagoguery direct the generated fury of disappointed groups to unworthy ends requires the lowest, not the highest type of political leadership. It is in times of distress and excitement that the spirit of destruction is easily stirred and unleashed. Every nostrum, proposed at such a period of unrest as a cure for economic ailments, is received with credulity by masses of people who in normal times would ignore such proposals.

As a panacea for existing ills, the unscrupulous do not hesitate to suggest legislation known by them to be beyond the power of Congress to legally enact. This is done with the hope of procuring a political following.

When the courts hold such legislation illegal, the authors of these unsound proposals endeavor to fix the blame upon the courts, which leads the thoughtless to condemn the latter instead of the former.

The President, in his message of March 3, 1936, endeavored to justify the experimental tax bill now before the House by attributing the necessity for such legislation to the decision of the Supreme Court, which declared the A. A. A. unconstitutional. Deprived of the revenue, illegally collected from American taxpayers as a result of unconstitutional legislation, recommended by the administration and passed by a servile Congress, the President now seeks to blame the Court for performing its sworn duty.

The other excuse the President offers for demanding at this time the enactment of this drastic, coercive, experimental tax measure is the payment required under the Adjusted Compensation Act. The President makes much of this item, although, as every person conversant with the facts knows, the payment of this just obligation will require only an additional 1½ percent of the annual expenditures. The President ignores the fact that he has spent billions of dollars upon boondoggling projects, the chief effect of which is to create new debts, while the adjusted compensation, which he disapproved, is to pay off an existing debt.

The spectacle of another fantastic, experimental proposal such as the one with which we are confronted today is an experience to which the Congress is becoming gradually hardened.

An existing system of producing revenue is to be scrapped for an experimental method considered and rejected by both the Treasury and the Congress at various times during the past 16 years. An administrative process to which the country has become gradually adjusted through literally thousands of Treasury decisions is to be replaced by a proposal so vague, indefinite, and inchoate in its definitions that I venture the assertion that not 5 percent of the House nor half the majority of the committee could agree among themselves as to the administrative application of its major provisions. Imagine the manager of any one of the small corporations with a net income below $10,000 being told, in response to the question, "What is the tax on our undistributed net income?"—that it is—

> A percentage of the adjusted net income which is more than 10 and less than 20, the tax shall be a percentage of the adjusted net income equal to the sum of 4, plus one-half of the amount by which the percentage which the undistributed net income is of the adjusted net income exceeds 10.

The unfortunate inquirer will discover that this measure is written with the lucidity that characterizes the Executive explanation of why Mr. Farley is at once the Postmaster General and the chairman of the Democratic National Committee. A revolution in corporate taxation is precipitated on this House overnight. Its amendment to existing law is scattered through 250 pages of the pending bill. The ambiguous explanation of its theory and effect are made available to this membership 24 hours before it is to be jammed through this uninformed body, after 16 hours of debate. Remember, the public hearings upon this measure were never addressed to a bill. Never before in our legislative history has the country or the committee been invited to discuss Presidential messages or the abstractions of a subcommittee as the basis for an unprecedented change in our methods of business taxation. The only public support given to the vague proposals pending before our committee was offered by the representative of the Communist Party, who, having identified the outlines of his creed under the rhetorical drapery of the Presidential message, did not hesitate to give a Communist blessing to the amorphous proposals of the subcommittee. This inchoate conception is now to be baptized in the ritual of the Executive message of March 3 as—> such a revision of our corporate taxes as would effect great simplification in tax procedure, in corporate accounting, and in the understanding of the whole subject by the citizens of the Nation.

It shall be my endeavor to paraphrase the Executive suggestion and clarify "the understanding of the whole subject" before us "by the citizens of the Nation."

It is my strong conviction that, as the pending measure is analyzed, it will become clear:

First. That its alleged beneficiaries are its victims. For, as the majority has carefully refrained from stating in its report, it is a method of taxation which no nation, except possibly Norway, has even attempted in the form here suggested and which, in principle, has been consistently rejected since first called to congressional attention. It will operate to penalize forethought and corporate savings. It will penalize the accumulation of reserves without which the vast majority of American business and private individuals could not have survived the depression. It arbitrarily discriminates against the small stockholder whose savings are invested in corporations with larger earnings and favors the larger stockholder in the corporation of smaller earnings. It will discourage the organization of new enterprises. It will tend to freeze existing surplus and discourage the expansion of older industry. It will tend to make entrance into any form of business more difficult. More and more it will plainly operate to make more difficult the maintenance of existing employment and defeat its expansion.

Second. The pending proposal will not assure a reliable flow of revenue. On the contrary, it is a final step in the drastic regulation of American business rather than a workable proposal to produce revenue.

Let me first direct your attention to the fact that we are not legislating in a vacuum but in a world of practical realities. Nearly one-third of our national income is consumed by public expenditure—National, State, and local. Approximately one-fourth of our national income is taken by direct taxation. The remainder of the third represents the issuance of public securities or outgo in excess of income. This is merely deferred taxation. The chief business of American banks in recent years has been the financing of our national deficit. American business, between 1930–34, expended $27,000,000,000 in excess of its income from the savings of former years, while the Government spent less than half that sum on direct relief in 1933–34.

And this was done while business was receiving about half its usual income and that of the Government had increased about 116 percent. We have, moreover, established a Federal social-security system imposing on employers and employees a volume of excise and income taxes without precedent in this country and which will progressively increase without any change in existing law over the next 20 years. Within the next 3 years the Federal unemployment compensation tax will levy upon the pay rolls of the country a 3-percent tax, which it is conservatively estimated will approximate more than 10 percent of the earnings of business.

Our people not only confront the burden of an unprecedented national debt but unparalleled State and local indebtedness. Our Federal Budget is not only unbalanced but no estimate of probable expenditure, from the highest to the lowest Federal fiscal authority, has, even within a 6-month period, been approximately accurate. Worst of all, no rational limitation of expenditure or any reform and improvement in wasteful administration, daily becoming more apparent, is in sight.

Never in the history of the Nation was it more essential that we should approach the subject of taxation with more caution and greater opportunity for thoughtful discussion. Both are denied. We are legislating in haste, with inadequate information and little regard for the effect of what we here do upon those activities which not only provide our revenue but support and animate the life of our people. The majority is sailing over an economic sea as unconscious of the depths below it as a chip upon its surface.

What does this bill propose to do, and how does the majority propose to do it? I put aside the proposed tax on "unjust enrichment", a phrase that will excite legal laughter for years to come, and confine myself to the corporate taxes. At present we levy a capital-stock tax upon corporate issues, a minimum of 12½ percent on the first $2,000 of corporate net income, 13 percent on such income between $2,000 and $15,000, 14 percent on such income between $15,000 and $40,000, and on all in excess of the latter amount 15 percent. These and existing personal-income taxes, which it is not proposed to change except in one respect—to which I will refer later—are, according to the reports of the Treasury, yielding a steadily enlarging revenue and will continue to do so unless business declines under the proposed increase of its burdens and the multiplication of its uncertainties.

The majority propose to abolish progressively, within slightly more than a year, these existing taxes and substitute therefor a tax upon the undistributed earnings of such corporations; that is, instead of levying the tax upon all net income received by a corporation, which is our usual method, and permitting the management of the corporation to determine what proportion of such income shall be distributed through dividends to the shareholders or retained for reserves or business expenditures, it is proposed to divide all corporations into three groups according to the amount of their net income and tax them upon a graduated scale with respect to the amount of such net income which is not distributed in dividends.

The three classes will be constituted of: (1) Those corporations whose net income is $10,000 or less, (2) those which have incomes between $10,000 and $40,000, (3) those which have more than $40,000 of net income. The first class will pay a tax of from ten-hundredths of 1 percent to 29½ percent, according as they retain from 1 percent to 70 percent of the net income. The second class will pay intermediate rates, and the third class a rate reaching 42½ percent on the top ratio of nondistribution. Banks, trust and insurance companies will pay a flat rate of 15 percent on net income as they do now, and so will corporations in receivership. The majority think it a wise provision to leave the enumerated corporations out of their plan, "since the surplus of banks must be built up for the protection of depositors", and, of course, they must apply the same reasoning to the returns from the investments of insurance companies. It never seems to occur to them that the protection of the shareholder, the integrity of the corporation, and the capacity to employ reserves for the purpose of maintaining employment, the only way in which it has been retained by a majority of corporations throughout the depression, are of equal importance. This view becomes clearer as we note the treatment proposed by the majority in this bill for deficits and contracts not to pay dividends and debts.

It is, of course, obvious to the membership of the House that the devastating depression sweeping the world fell with unusual force upon our own country and impaired the strength of even our strongest enterprises. To rebuild an impaired capital structure is, of course, the first concern of good management. Savings today are of two kinds—corporate and individual. The individual saves against his rainy day and leaves his funds in a bank, an insurance policy, or some other form of investment. Such savings find their way back into business. Corporate savings are employed to maintain and expand existing business and, according to the nature of the corporate business, to meet its requirements by such reserves as are peculiar to the character of its operation. All business goes forward, all national development goes forward, under the impulse of surplus. Only what any people have over and above that which is necessary to sustain their individual and social life is available for its expansion. The nation without a surplus is the nation without a future. That is equally true of the individual and the enterprise. At no time in American economic history has the necessity been so great for the repair of impaired capital and the rebuilding of business structures, little and great.

What does the majority propose to do in this bill with respect to deficits and impaired capital structures? It proposes to say to the corporation that needs to rebuild its capital structure, meet its deficits, rebuild its expended capital, provide for expansion, and accept new risks that mean new employment—

> If you want to retain, as you should, the greater part of your earnings, this year or next, for that purpose, you will pay as follows for the privilege:
> By section 14 of the bill, the corporation with a deficit will pay 22½ percent on the amount of earnings retained to make up this deficit. That will be 7½ percent more than the present highest corporate rate. In addition, if you want to retain any earnings in excess of the deficit, which merely makes you solvent, the penalty for creating a sound reserve will be the graduated rate applicable to the additional earnings which you do not distribute.

By section 15 the majority says to thousands of corporations which have borrowed publicly or privately, to maintain operations and employment and have made a contract not to pay dividends until they have met this debt obligation:

> We will treat you generously. We simply ask you to pay 22½ percent of the undistributed income which you set aside to meet that obligation, without making which you probably could not have survived. But, mind you, you cannot have that privilege unless your contract was made before the President made public the revelation which we propose to make effective. If you have struggled under a great debt burden and refinanced it, after this apocalyptical delivery, you are the victim of legislative misfortune. You should have read Tugwell and divined what was to occur. Failing to do so, you must pay the graduated penalty.

Never before has the lawmaking body of a great nation, working its way out of a devastating depression and burdened with debt, threatened its citizens with an Oregon boot of taxation as the price of reviving their capacity for employment.

I take it that no Member of this House denies that a tax on a corporation is a tax on the stockholder. It is he who, under the strange paradox of this bill, is at once the subject of the committee's solicitude and chastisement. Every tax levied upon a corporation is assessed against the beneficial interest of the shareholder. By this measure he may be taxed three times—the normal tax; by surtax, which, you must remember, begins to attach itself to an income in excess of $4,000; and, thirdly, he will carry the tax levied against the undistributed income. That, in accordance with its effect upon the corporation, whose condition is as variable as that of the individual, may result in the decline of the share value of the stock in accordance with the capacity of the corporation to sustain itself, or the effect it may have upon contracting or denying expansion to its operations. Perhaps even more seriously, it stops new enterprise. This bill is in reality an industrial birth-control measure.

Until a few short years ago no one dissented from the view that it was the business of Government to promote, protect, and encourage every form of business. Now let the gentlemen of the majority examine without a blush their proposed handiwork. Let them rechristen this child of their leader's speculation "A bill to penalize saving, to discourage enterprise, to prevent the restoration of impaired capital, to obstruct expansion, and to lessen opportunity for employment."

Who is the beneficiary of this plan? Is it the small shareholder? The majority apparently imagines, from the statements made throughout its report, that the chief function of the citizen is to pay taxes. Incidentally he may seek a livelihood, build an enterprise, and employ others. But at the risk of preventing him from building up essential savings, which alone insure the security of his enterprise, the privilege of saving must be made the subject of an excise. Since the days of the Psalmist saving has been a stimulated virtue. It has remained for the majority, under the whip of their distinguished leader, to penalize it as a vice. They have, moreover, lost all sense of distinction between the position of the small stockholder in the enterprise of large earnings and the large stockholder in the enterprise of small earnings. In the diffusion of ownership, which is the marked characteristic of modern American business, the small stockholder has more frequently invested his savings in the enterprise with higher earnings, because it appealed to him as having better management and assuring the likelihood of a larger return. I notice, for example, that our largest corporation, the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., started with 7,500 stockholders and now has 750,000. I hold no brief for it, but I cannot overlook the fact that the average stockholding is about 28 shares and nobody owns more than 1 percent of the stock. If that corporation, for example, is carried, as it undoubtedly will be, into that class of corporations whose earnings are in excess of $40,000 per year, it may, in the rebuilding of its capital, feel it necessary to reserve a considerable portion of its earnings. If it does, the high rate which it pays for that privilege will be assessed against the beneficial interest of the holders of an average of 28 shares of stock, while in what are described as "closely held corporations", with a low rate of earnings, the privilege of nondistribution will be correspondingly less.

I am concerned about the serious effect of this proposal upon the small shareholder and upon the employing capacity of business enterprise threatened with the enervating effects of this punitive measure. If I turn to the declaration of purpose made by the majority, I find it stated:

> The major purposes of the change in the method of taxing corporate incomes are (1) to prevent avoidance of surtax by individuals through the accumulation of income by corporations; (2) to remove serious inequities and inequalities between corporate, partnership, and individual forms of business organizations; and (3) to remove the inequity as between large and small shareholders resulting from the present flat corporate rates.

It is related that a French scientist, insisting upon a theory, was confronted with destructive facts. Undeterred by the evidence, he retorted, "So much the worse for the facts." That alone, it seems to me, can be the position of the majority in the face of the information which has been developed in response to the declaration I have quoted.

Before our committee hearings it was iterated and reiterated that dividend distribution, broadly speaking, was niggardly. The opinion was sedulously created that in comparison with earnings there was a vast current fund annually withheld which ought, in the interest of the stockholder and the Government, be forced into distribution where it could be taxed in the possession particularly of those subject to the higher surtaxes. The facts completely refute the assertion. The undisputed evidence before our committee discloses that over a 14-year period, between 1921 and 1934, taking the total dividend distribution of all corporations, the figures being supplied by the Internal Revenue Department, it is shown that the dividends paid were 25 percent in excess of the earnings over the same period. In the field of manufacture the same sources reveal a distribution of over two hundred millions in excess of earnings covering the same period. The significant fact is that during the period of depression, distribution from previous accumulations were made during period of deficit. Dividend payments that otherwise could not have been paid were made during that period as a steady contribution to purchasing power. The majority is now here recommending the abandonment of the proposal which it made 2 short years ago—to penalize the accumulation of unreasonable surplus. The efficient collectors of the Treasury have been unable to locate the unreasonable accumulations that were said to exist; therefore, a rumor has been dissipated.

Moreover, not only is the theory upon which the majority started this effort destroyed by the facts but they proceed upon a further untenable theory. The only way in which they could insure that a forced distribution of earnings would increase surtax collections would be to possess the gift of prophecy, through hypothetical determination of the income-tax bracket into which the forced distribution would fall. They assume that can be definitely determined in advance. They overlook the fact that National and State governments have provided more than thirty billions of wholly or partially tax-exempt securities in which the large investor, if many such remain, may find refuge. In the public interest, it is the last place to which he ought to be driven. For economic recovery and business development and progress rest upon creating innumerable new temptations which will seduce the investor into placing his funds in active enterprise. There alone they continually multiply employment.

Three years of experience has demonstrated that Government may provide relief and enlarge its cost by wasteful administration. But unless we accept the tenets of a socialistic state, it cannot take up the employment slack. That must be done by thousands of vigorous minds continually attempting and actively engaged in the efficient development of our own resources and the creation of new services in response to the demands of the people, who look determinedly forward in the improvement of their own condition as uncertainties are removed and commitments to the future constantly multiplied. I challenge the majority to produce any substantial evidence before this House that we have found evidence of either serious avoidance of surtax by individuals or of undue accumulation of income by corporations.

The majority further declares that it wants to remove the serious inequities and inequalities between corporate, partnership, and individual forms of business organization. In the first place, to the extent that that inequity may be shown to exist, it does not require an increase in the tax rate on the corporate shareholder. The remedy could be provided, as was suggested long ago by Dr. Adams, noted expert, by providing an exemption for the individual and the partnership which invested undistributed income in taxables. Again, there is nothing which prevents the individual or the partnership from incorporating if it is to the advantage of the business to do so.

Finally, I desire to produce a witness whose qualification as an expert the majority cannot question, who will testify that the overwhelming majority of individual and partnership business pays less taxes, operating as it does, than it would if incorporated. My witness is the Honorable Robert H. Jackson, now Assistant Attorney General of the United States in charge of the Tax Division of the Department of Justice and formerly General Counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue in the Treasury Department. He addressed the Young Democratic Club of New York City, March 18 last, in support of the President's tax plan. In the course of that address he declared:

> A business of small profit costs less tax if done by the individual without incorporation. If the net profit of a business is under about $18,000, it now costs more in taxes to be incorporated than to operate as an individual. A partnership is cheaper in taxes than a corporation, if the share of profits of each partner is less than $18,000 a year.

The income statistics of the Bureau of Internal Revenue disclose that the overwhelming number of those engaged in business in the individual or partnership form show a profit below the maximum stated by Mr. Jackson. From the evidence supplied by this qualified witness, it must be clear that individuals and partners in great number prefer that form for the obvious advantages which Mr. Jackson describes. In view of this testimony the preponderant body of business done in these forms must be praying to be saved from its friends in the majority.

Finally, I think I have clearly pointed out that this bill will not remove any alleged inequity between large and small shareholders resulting from the present flat corporate rates. The trouble with the majority is that it fails to distinguish between the small shareholder in the corporations of large earnings and either the small or large shareholder in the corporation of comparatively smaller earnings. It continually reasons on the gratuitous and insupportable hypothesis that its plan will catch a few large payers of surtax. It overlooks the fact that in the endeavor to do so it is levying its highest rates on the man who has saved and invested in the shares of a corporation of higher earning power that pursues the wise policy of not distributing too great a proportion of its earnings. He is its appointed victim.

The revenue-producing capacity of this proposal is hypothetical and conjectural. It assumes a condition predicated upon so many variables of human nature that it offends against the most fundamental tenet of sound taxation—the assurance of reliable revenue. The reason for that must be partly found in the second fundamental objection I have raised to this measure. It is a regulatory rather than a revenue measure. It is the final step in subjecting the business structure of the United States and the livelihood of its citizens to drastic Federal regulation in all their major operations. This becomes evident as we examine the successive steps of which this is the ultimate.

The first act of corporate life is the issuance of a security. We have now our Security and Exchange Acts regulating in minute detail under continuing administrative control the issuance of securities and the conditions under which they may be marketed and dealt. Through proposals to enlarge the powers and investigative authority of the Federal Trade Commission all competition and the conduct, policies, and practices of corporations are subjected to intimate supervision. By the National Labor Relations Act there has been established control of all local employment relations in production, while further direction over prices and operation has been steadily suggested. We now reach the ultimate step—Federal control of the distribution of the proceeds of business operation. This measure substitutes for the judgment of responsible management, responsive to and representing the shareholders, the inflexible judgment of Congress with respect to the distribution of business earnings. Confronted with every variety of business operation; with large and small earnings, with activities of little risk and of great risk, with the production of consumer and durable goods, with business requiring little capital and much, with impaired and unimpaired fiscal structure, with every conceivable difference in debt and investment requirements, with young and old enterprises, you propose to determine in advance, irrespective of circumstances, the amount of savings for every form of business in the United States. You blindly do this by fixing in advance not the amount but the penalty which shall be exacted for savings out of income. You would not dare to do this with regard to the farmer or the wage earner. Yet you boldly venture to do it for corporate or collective business by substituting your judgment for that of those who must meet all the individual risks of their enterprise in the light of circumstances which they alone know and against which they project their experience. This is legislative medievalism. It is faith in an all-wise, all-seeing, and omnipotent lawmaker whose collective political wisdom is superior to the individual business judgment and experience of his subjects. It calls for executive divinity.

The genesis of the idea is not far to seek. The idea itself may have been hastily presented to this House. Its expression may have been superficially conceived and executed. Your consideration may be hurried by the voice of your master. But the source of the idea cannot be concealed. If you will look to that flowing fountain of ideas so steadily supplying your party policy—Dr. Tugwell—you will find that in 1933 in his textbook of the administration entitled "Industrial Discipline", he writes, at page 206, of the importance of a tax on undistributed earnings: "Over and above replacement, which are kept for expansion purposes"—to force—"these funds into distribution as dividends."

This, of course, is in addition to control of capital issues which he has already urged and which we already have. He, of course, goes a step further, and in that direction, I presume, the majority will receive its instructions to march, if not now, probably at Philadelphia; for Mr. Tugwell declares that it is essential to carrying these controls beyond merely the seizure of undistributed earnings by "capital allocation", which, he says, "would depend on knowledge from some planning agency of how much for an unearned future period ought to be put to one use rather than to other." Then he continues:

> There is not only the problem of knowing what the industry's output will be or ought to be, but also of knowing how much of the business will go to each firm involved. * * * The functions of another sort of administration. * * * Some principle of apportionment would have to be adopted (p. 205).

Thus we perceive the tax on undistributed earnings clearly presented as a plan of industrial control contemporaneous with the inauguration of the present administration and to be carried forward into capital allocation itself. A logical step from which the majority may now shrink, but like other things which they formerly regarded with a shudder, they may soon habitually suffer themselves to embrace.

What is presented for your approval today is a hasty, superficial, undigested substitute for the present corporate method of taxation which, with all its defects, is nevertheless something to which the business of the country has become adjusted and which is providing steadily increasing revenue. In exchange for this you are asked to accept a continuously rejected suggestion which in effect will do that which you yourselves could not approve a year ago—operate as a graduated tax on corporation profit. The burden of it will fall not only on the business entity but with arbitrary and discriminative weight upon every small holder of stock. You are to do this in pursuit of an unidentified surtax avoider and you are asked, like a drunkard entering into a room and with but one thought to reach his bed, to give no attention to the furniture you may wreck in the effort. Every business witness before our committee has raised a warning voice. Every authoritative economist in the country has added his caution. You are creating obviously a host of new administrative difficulties. A whole pathway of enforcement will be lined with new question marks. You ask the business of the Nation, shaken by 5 years of continuous drains, to pay penalty premiums in order to do that which you ought to be begging them to do—to deny themselves the privilege of beneficial distribution in order to rebuild shattered reserves and maintain and expand employment. Unless one man can employ another at profit he cannot longer afford to employ him at all. That is equally true of men engaging in an enterprise together and forming what is termed a corporation, be it large or small.

If you were determined to discourage investment, to counsel against the maintenance of employment, to prohibit its expansion, to multiply uncertainty, and to make more difficult every form of future commitment to promote business development, it is difficult to conceive a more certain method of going about it. To the few whose business enterprises have accumulated ample surplus in their maturity, this plan may be a boon. To the vast majority of corporations struggling with their daily problem, it will represent in varying degrees new burdens and anxiety creating discouragements. To new enterprise it is a deliberate obstruction to the establishment of essential reserves. To new enterprise in contemplation, it is a warning of excessive cost not likely to be disregarded. Taken as a whole it is final evidence, if more were needed, of the practical incapacity of those presently charged with the administration of Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York 3 additional minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Right in that connection I should like to call the gentleman's attention to the testimony of Mr. Sargent, on page 216 of the hearings, where he said:

> Sweden had a tax on undistributed profits in 1924, which was subsequently abandoned. In 1933 a "compensation tax" was enacted which applies a flat-rate tax of 25 percent in certain cases on undistributed earnings of Swedish companies engaged solely in the real estate and marketable securities business.

Mr. Sargent also testified to the fact that Holland has a law just the opposite to what we are proposing here. If the gentleman will indulge me, the Members of the Committee may be interested in the fact that Holland has exactly the reverse of the undistributable earnings tax, namely, a tax levied on profits distributed by companies to those entitled to a share of them, with no tax at all levied on undistributed profits. This may be an example of the Dutch idea of inculcating thrift in industrial companies as well as in the home.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I understand Members speaking have the right to revise and extend their remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. That privilege has already been given.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BIERMANN. As I recall it, the rule under which this bill is being considered provides that general debate must be confined to the bill.

I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the first several pages of the statement read by the gentleman from New York were confined not to the bill but constituted a partisan attack on some of the high officials of this Government. One of them was the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, Secretary Wallace, who was represented as a reprehensible citizen for speaking against the morality, not the legality, of the Supreme Court's decision which resulted in the return of large taxes to processors.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not stating a point of order.

Mr. BIERMANN. In Iowa for generations we have had the highest regard for the Wallace family as citizens and as patriotic people. I want the RECORD to show at this point that the gentleman from New York in his remarks was not only violating the rule and proceeding out of order but he was doing unwarranted violence to the plain facts.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa insist upon his point of order?

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHENER. If the gentleman withdraws his point of order, he concedes it has no merit. I therefore ask that his remarks be expunged from the RECORD.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. BIERMANN. I made a point of order that involved the reference I just repeated that the gentleman from New York was not proceeding in order in the first several pages of his written statement.

Mr. Chairman, I renew my point of order.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I believe the gentleman from New York was doing the best he could under the circumstances.

Mr. KNUTSON. He was just following the salutary example set for us yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order that the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], who has just spoken, was out of order in that he referred to a member of the Cabinet in the discussion of this bill and in his speech. Members of the Cabinet and, indeed, even the President of the United States, are not sacrosanct from discussion on the floor of the House provided the Member speaking observes the rules of the House in not dealing in personalities and conducts himself while speaking with proper decorum.

The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I inquire, Mr. Chairman, in view of the ruling of the Chair, whether the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa will appear in the RECORD?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's remarks were made as a statement of a point of order, and, of course, the remarks will appear.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I suggest to the Chair that the gentleman apparently withdrew his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa would have the right to withdraw his point of order, but that would not withdraw the remarks he made.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. LAMNECK. I yield, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, the question that came into my mind when the gentleman from Iowa objected to criticism of a Cabinet officer was whether a Member on the Democratic side could criticize members of the Ways and Means Committee in the drafting of this bill; if a Member on the Democratic side of the House has the right to criticize Members on the Republican side who make remarks in regard to this bill; and if Republicans are not permitted to say something about Democrats whether they are Members of the House or members of the Cabinet when they are doing things absolutely contrary to good common sense and American principles?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, the remarks I shall make today will not be made from a political angle whatsoever; I am going to express my firm convictions in regard to this bill.

First, Mr. Chairman, I register a protest against the chairman of the committee, who has refused to grant a member of the committee in opposition to the bill time on the floor.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield at this time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I dispute the gentleman's charge.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is proper procedure. I think it is just as important, I would say more important, to hear a member of the committee, whether he belongs to the Democratic side or the Republican side, who is in opposition to a bill.

Mr. Chairman, how can we determine the merits of a bill unless we hear both sides of the question? Now, when a Republican opposes this bill the claim is immediately made that he is opposing the bill for partisan reasons. As a Democratic member of the Ways and Means Committee, I am telling you my opposition is based upon a firm conviction that the bill is no good. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I wrote my chairman a letter, and in order not to mislead him I said, "Mr. DOUGHTON, I want 30 minutes to present my views", and I said further, "I am going to present views in opposition to this bill." I did not want any mistaken idea about what I was going to say. I received no reply to that letter, but I did have a personal conversation with the gentleman, and he advised me if I wanted to be heard I should go to the opposition for time—meaning the Republican side.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMNECK. I refuse to yield.

Mr. Chairman, I want to thank Mr. TREADWAY for being considerate enough to give me time to present my views.

I represent in this Congress the greatest district in America, consisting of 400,000 people, and they expect me to present my views here whenever the opportunity presents itself. I know when a man is not a member of the committee many times he has no opportunity to be heard, but, Mr. Chairman, seriously I claim that any member of a committee—and I do not care who he is—who wants time to present his views either in favor of or in opposition to a bill ought to be permitted to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this tax bill, in my judgment, is a Chinese puzzle. I should like to see the man in this House who can determine now what this bill really will do or what the final effect will be. I do not think the man is living who can do it, and I will bet there are not 25 Members of the House who know anything about this bill. If you do not know about it, how are you going to vote on it intelligently? [Applause.] If we debated this bill for 6 months, there would still be a lot to find out about it. The committee was in session considering this bill 8 or 9 weeks. I attended many sessions of the committee. Why, they did not know from one day to the next what the real import of the bill was. The tax experts did not know. They would go into a huddle and say, "What does this mean? What effect is that going to have?" Day after day they would debate one point of the bill in order to determine what its real effect was.

There are 248 pages in this bill to bring out two points. The first point, to assess a corporate tax against earnings, and the other to collect from processors the windfall tax. It took 248 pages to devise a law which would accomplish that result. Then they talk about not debating the bill, and denying men in opposition the right to be heard. I am not only complaining about myself in this case but I want to complain on behalf of every Member of Congress who wants to be heard, especially when he is a member of the committee and is denied that right.

Mr. Chairman, we hear a lot about Jefferson these days. Jefferson once said that when the people are well informed and things get so far wrong as to attract their notice they may be relied upon to set them right. I want to say if this Congress understands the proposition and if the Members would sometimes forget their party affiliation and their prejudices, they would make decisions differently than they have been made in the past.

We are today engaged in serious business. I dare say that if the new tax bill becomes a law it will shock the very foundation of the business structure of this country.

On March 30, in addressing the House, I was not certain as to what the real objectives of the bill were and asked the question, Whom are we trying to reach? I have the answer to that now, and for your information will say, on my own responsibility, that the principal aim of this bill is to compel the distribution of earnings of the closely held corporation, the most striking example of which is the Ford Motor Co. There is no escape, because if the earnings are retained in this company in their entirety a tax of 42½ percent will be assessed. If they are distributed to the small group owning this company, they will be compelled to pay the individual income tax amounting to 75 percent.

If Henry Ford should pass to the Great Beyond to receive his reward, his estate would be assessed a tax of 70 percent under existing law.

If he gave his property away before he passed on, he would be assessed a tax of 52½ percent under existing law. Why not wait until the grim reaper settles the Ford question and other business institutions similarly situated and permit them to go forward furnishing employment for men and women and providing an income for the families of these individuals, because at best Mr. Ford cannot stay with us very much longer and the results that will be accomplished under this bill will be accomplished anyway under existing law?

Who is there among us that would say that Henry Ford has not rendered a great public service for the people of this country and the world?

Today, ladies and gentlemen, he is employing 180,000 men and women directly and about a million people depend upon him for their daily bread, and yet we are advocating a tax plan that tends to destroy such a business institution.

I have no brief for Henry Ford whatsoever, but I am simply pointing out the effect of the tax bill we are proposing.

I have no quarrel with the thought that taxes should be assessed for the expenses of government based upon the ability to pay, but I seriously object to any program that tends to destroy not only the group at which this bill is aimed but also to the thousands and hundreds of thousands of small business institutions of this country, most of whom are now in distress.

Chief Justice Marshall, in rendering the majority opinion in the case of McCulloch against The State of Maryland, February term of Court in 1819, said—

> That the power to tax involves the power to destroy; that the power to destroy may defeat and render useless the power to create; * * * are propositions not to be denied.

The Congress of the United States has refrained up to this time from passing any tax legislation that would tend to destroy, but I charge that this bill will destroy absolutely thousands of business concerns of this country, and in the remarks to follow I expect to illustrate strikingly this effect.

There is another principle involved in this tax bill to which I want to call your attention, and that is that we attempt by taxing methods to compel business institutions to follow our bidding.

No such power is vested in the Constitution of the United States. We have a right to tax for the purpose of paying the expenses of the Government as provided for under the Constitution but we have no right to use the taxing power to direct the activities of legitimate business. [Applause.]

There is another result probably not intended by the sponsors of this legislation, and that is in many cases this tax measure will result in a capital levy. I expect to illustrate later on in my remarks how this will happen.

Business institutions throughout the country are greatly concerned as to the final effects of this legislation, and I believe their fears are well founded.

I just came back from my district, and I talked to hundreds of men in the last 2 or 3 days who are scared to death because a tax bill is being proposed here.

Some of the proponents of this bill are probably proceeding on the theory that all business is in a prosperous condition and that when this law goes into effect they will distribute no more earnings than they are now distributing. You will hear the argument used, I am sure, that the corporations will not be required to pay any more taxes under this bill than they do under existing law.

Who have been the advocates of this legislation? The only persons I have heard advocating it are the experts from the Treasury Department, none of whom, I dare say, have ever had any business experience.

I am wondering how many Members of the House of Representatives have ever owned a business, have ever operated a business, have ever been responsible for a pay roll on Saturday, and who have worried from Monday until Saturday to see from where the next pay roll is coming. Unless you have, ladies and gentlemen, you do not know what business is.

Business is a tough game, for it has many hazards, and at the best requires self-denial, close application, long hours, and every other trait that goes with thrift and initiative.

How would you like to be tried by a prejudiced jury that could not see your side of the case at all, and, if they did listen to the testimony, absolutely ignore the effect upon you? This, ladies and gentlemen, is exactly the situation that prevailed during the consideration of this bill.

One commentator said that the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee were a legislative farce and that the bill would be entirely rewritten in the Senate. I believe this will be the case. Why not heed that warning and write our own tax bill and not have our eyes and ears closed to all other proposals except those that were suggested by someone else?

Mr. Chairman, I am told that the man who is really responsible for this bill is a man by the name of David C. Coyle. Whoever heard of him? Whose duty is it to write a tax bill? Whoever heard of Coyle? I never did.

It is our duty to write a tax bill. [Applause.] The Ways and Means Committee should write a tax bill, and, when we go into session to consider a tax bill, I claim that every proposition that will tend to raise revenue and not hurt the taxpayer should be considered by us, and the best tax bill possible should be passed.

The proposed tax bill is unfair in many of its provisions. It plays favorites. It penalizes business institutions that are prevented by law from paying dividends. It penalizes businesses who have contractual obligations. It penalizes certain lines of industry to a greater extent who do not have State laws to prevent their paying dividends and who have no contractual obligations not to pay them. It will seriously interfere with the credit of corporations now in existence. Banks will be compelled to be more strict in extending credit to corporations whose financial standing is not of the best, because of the severe penalties provided under this tax measure.

It will tend toward monopoly. It will prevent weak corporations and those with impaired capital from rebuilding their capital structure which has been terribly depleted during the depression. It will prevent the accumulation of the necessary surplus for the rainy day to pay dividends during the depression, to keep men employed during the depression years; it will prevent business from accumulating earnings for plant improvement and for developments generally. It will tend toward overcapitalization; it advocates a policy exactly opposite to our past history of saving and paying our debts.

This bill will not produce the revenue its sponsors claim. It will have a tendency to make corporations pay dividends in the year following the time they are earned and I actually believe in the year 1936 the revenue will be less than under existing law.

This point has been very strikingly illustrated in the testimony of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL].

Here is a company, and I do not think there is any secret about this, the American Can Co.—you have all heard of it—in 1935 they made a profit of $17,310,303. They paid out in dividends $15,256,321, or 88.13 percent of their earnings, and why? They had no bonded debt. They had no borrowed money from the banks. They could pay it all out and it would not hurt them at all. Now, what is going to happen to this company? They will distribute all their earnings, they will not pay any tax, and if the stockholders are in the lower brackets the Government will lose from 6 to 10 percent.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. What about the corporation?

Mr. LAMNECK. Here is another company, the Anaconda Copper Mining Co. This company made $11,180,087 last year and did not pay any dividends. Why? Because they had an outstanding indebtedness of $83,077,000, and if the president of that corporation or its board of directors had advocated the payment of a dividend, they would have taken them over to some insane asylum; and yet we propose to say to that company, "If you make $11,000,000 in 1936 and do not distribute dividends you will pay a tax of 42.5 percent."

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LAMNECK. I know what the gentleman is going to say. He is going to say that we only tax them 22.5 percent, but the gentleman does not know that this company has a surplus of $48,163,651 and funded debt and bank loans of $83,077,000.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If you have a surplus of $48,000,000 and owe $83,000,000, you have a deficit there of $35,000,000 according to your own statement.

Mr. LAMNECK. I am not talking about the assets. I am stating that the funded debt of this company is $83,000,000 and they have a surplus of $48,000,000.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If you have a funded debt of $83,000,000 and a surplus of $48,000,000, 48 from 83 would be $35,000,000, and if you would amortize that over a period of 5 years you could put $7,000,000 of your $11,000,000 in net income to the payment of that debt at a rate of 22.5 percent and the other $4,000,000 would be distributed under this plan.

Mr. LAMNECK. You could do that under certain conditions, but it would not apply to this company.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. How old is your debt? It is certainly more than 3 years old.

Mr. LAMNECK. I refuse to yield any further.

Now, here is another company, B. F. Goodrich Co., which in 1935 made $3,429,000 and did not pay any dividends, and they were wise in not paying them, because they owed $37,000,000.

Here is another company, Bethlehem Steel Corporation, which made $11,509,020 and paid out $3,268,604, or 28.4 percent, and the reason they did not pay more was because they had a funded debt of $98,000,000.

Here is Armour & Co., which made $9,000,000 and paid $7,000,000, or nearly 75 percent of their earnings in dividends, and the reason they could do that was because they had a surplus of $49,000,000.

Now, I presume I have called attention to enough of these concerns to illustrate my point.

I want to call to your attention the actual conditions in which certain business institutions find themselves. Here is a company that in 1931 lost $496,521; in 1932, $830,447; in 1933, $742,340; in 1934, $138,840; and in 1935, $549,716.

In addition to this, they owe in back interest on their bonds $669,101.64. Any sound executive running this company when earnings are again made would not pay a dividend, and if that policy were pursued the tax bill now under consideration would assess a penalty of 42½ percent against such corporation; and if their earnings in the succeeding 5 years should equal their losses in the last 5 years, it would take this company approximately 10 years to have the same financial standing as they had in 1931, and they would still be behind with interest of over $669,101.64, the amount to which I referred above.

I want to call this case to the particular attention of the Democratic chairman of the Rules Committee and the other Members from New York City because this company is located in that city.

My next illustration is a concern in Cleveland, Ohio. I call this to the particular attention of my Democratic colleagues, the Honorable MARTIN L. SWEENEY, ROBERT CROSSER, and also my distinguished colleague, the Honorable CHESTER BOLTON.

This company lost in 1931, $2,770,712.24; and in 1932, $3,771,147.29; in 1933, $3,168,589.28; in 1934, $1,183,147.10; and in 1935, $2,911,735.61.

It goes without saying that any executive who would advocate the distribution of dividends running this company would be fit for the insane asylum. Yet, we say, if you attempt to rebuild your capital structure by applying all your earnings your penalty is 42½ per cent; and, again, if the earnings in the succeeding 5 years were equal to the losses in the last 5 years, it would take 10 years before this company would hope to have the same financial status as in 1931.

If the earnings in the next 5 years are equal to the losses in the last 5 years, and we assess the tax of 42.5 percent, it will take until 1946 before this company will be in the same financial status it was in at 1930.

I might further say that this company had decreased its surplus about $21,000,000 since 1926, running a plant during the depression, keeping men employed at a great loss.

I know competitors of this particular company who have plenty of surplus who distribute more than 70 percent of their earnings, and will continue to do so, who are delighted that Congress, by legislation, will force into bankruptcy a substantial competitor.

I wish I had the time to go over this list I have here of companies that have distributed more than 70 percent of their earnings and will continue to do it. They are delighted that the Congress of the United States is passing a tax bill which will put these sick corporations out of business.

The next company I want to call to your attention is a company located in Michigan 40 or 50 miles from Toledo, Ohio. In 1929 they lost $155,875; in 1930, $332,548; in 1931, $204,535; and in 1932, $292,349.

If this company attempted to rebuild their losses for the 4 years mentioned they would be taxed 42½ percent, and, again, if the profits for the succeeding 4 years were equal to the losses in the last 4 years, it would take approximately 8 years to rebuild its capital structure.

Another company in Philadelphia in 1929 lost $351,046; in 1930, $732,843; in 1931, $663,353; in 1932, $317,618; and in 1933, $204,967.

If this company attempted to rebuild their capital structure they would be taxed 42½ percent, and it would take the same length of time as that applying to the other corporations.

Another corporation in Ohio in 1931 lost $300,000; in 1932, $400,000; in 1933, $80,000; in 1934, $400,000; and in 1935, $200,000.

This company, in addition to the losses from their operation, have preferred-stock dividends not paid of $31.50 a share. The number of shares outstanding is 16,589.

Here is a large construction industry in Philadelphia that lost in 1932, $1,019,875; in 1933, $1,362,111; in 1934, $517,219; and in 1935, $623,792.

Who would say that this company should pay dividends, and who would say that any penalty should be applied against this company with the experience they have had?

Another company, located in Toledo, Ohio—I call to the particular attention of my colleague the Honorable WARREN J. DUFFEY—in 1931 lost $4,495,796.96; in 1932, $3,847,638.40; in 1933, $2,815,959.89; in 1934, $121,485.88.

What justification is there for penalizing this company for trying to rebuild its capital structure?

Another company, located in Wheeling, W. Va.—which I desire to call to the attention of my colleague the Honorable ROBERT L. RAMSAY—lost in 1931, $3,415,443; in 1932, $3,315,637; in 1933, $249,079.

Here is a company that, in addition to having had these tremendous losses, was required to refinance and have a contract not to pay dividends; and yet the tax bill we propose increases their taxes 50 percent.

Another company in Virginia I call to the particular attention of my colleague the Honorable CLIFTON A. WOODRUM.

This company lost in 1932, $193,605; in 1933, $326,114; in 1934, $78,695; and in 1935, $8,923.

Should this company be penalized to the extent of 42½ percent when it attempts to put its house in order?

There is another company located in Virginia, a comparatively small company, lost in 1932, $21,134.57; in 1933, $19,975.93; in 1934, $12,044.15; and in 1935, $6,334.91.

The losses entailed by this small company are in excess of its total preferred stock outstanding. Fortunately it had some surplus and is still in the game, but the president of the company advises that if the bill is passed it will mean absolute ruination for them.

Another company in Ohio—I call to the particular attention of the Honorable FRANK L. KLOEB—lost in 1931, $1,414,128.63; in 1932, $890,536.68; in 1933, $646,893.94; in 1934, $490,825.94; and in 1935, $538,707.57.

This company has continued to operate and has reduced its surplus over $4,220,000. Practically all this went in the pay envelopes of men and women employees of this company.

Shall we penalize such a corporation that has been patriotic enough to assist with all its power in carrying us through this terrible depression?

I think I have illustrated the effect that this tax bill will have upon corporations whose financial standing is not of the best, and I dare say that this will apply to at least 75 percent of the business institutions in this country. It will mean more receiverships than we have had at any time within our history, if for no other reason than the fact that our tax bill provides that a corporation in receivership shall pay a tax of 15 percent, while a corporation, probably in just as bad a shape not wanting to go into receivership, would have to pay 22½ percent, or 42½ percent, as the case might be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more, but I suggest that he yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] for a statement.

Mr. LAMNECK. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman made the statement a few moments ago that David Cushman Coyle was the real author of this new tax bill, and he asked who ever heard of him. I, a Republican, have heard of him, and I will tell the House who he is. He has been one of the leading members of the "brain trust" of this administration for the last 3 years and associated with Mr. Tugwell. He is the same man who made the statement to 4,000 trained nurses in convention assembled in the Auditorium in Washington 2 years ago that saving for a rainy day and thrift are out of date; that saving for a rainy day only makes it rain all the harder. He is the same man who wrote a book published last November, in which he said that what this country needs to bring it back to prosperity is to raise and spend annually $50,000,000,000, this huge sum to be raised not by inflation but by taxation of income. In consideration of the fact that the total income of the country was only 45 billions in 1934 this statement may be cited as part of the asinine philosophy of the theorists now advising the present administration—unsound philosophies and theories which make thoughtful men and women cry out, "How long, O Lord, how long?" [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LAMNECK. I stated earlier that this bill would mean a capital levy in many cases. Assuming that a corporation owed a bank $50,000 which was borrowed today for working capital and at the end of the year they made $50,000 and took it over to pay the bank, the Government would assess a tax of 42½ percent against this corporation and the corporation would either have to borrow $21,250 or take it out of its capital, if it had any.

I claim that instead of passing a law increasing the tax rate on these sick corporations, as we do under this measure, we should at the worst leave it as it is and if there is a possibility of doing it, we should reduce the tax rate.

Another feature of this legislation I want to discuss for a moment or two is the so-called "windfall" proposal. This provides for a levy against the taxes assessed against processors not paid when the Triple A was declared unconstitutional, the rate to be 80 percent. Some processors passed the tax on to the consumers and others did not. The group that were not able to pass it on are the small independent pork packers who process about half of the pork in the United States. They have lost money from the day the processing tax was assessed, caused by the processing tax, the drought, and the decreased consumption of the American people.

If this bill, as proposed, is passed, it will put out of business a great majority of over 1,100 pork processors and will leave the packing industry practically in the hands of the large monopolistic group.

I do not know how you feel about it, but I cannot go along on a bill that may put out of business over 1,100 business concerns and destroy the possibility of employment for the group now employed in this industry.

I have quite a number of these packing houses in my congressional district, the largest one owing in processing taxes $930,565.29; their total available quick assets, including cash, accounts renewable, and product on hand and consigned to brokers, is $1,298,000. If the Government collects this tax, it will mean that the total quick assets of this company must be sold to pay the tax lien. This company has been in business for some 50 years—it has always made money until the processing tax went into effect.

I urge you, ladies and gentlemen, to give serious consideration to this feature of the bill before casting your vote.

In conclusion, the claim that is made for this legislation is that it will cause a greater distribution of earnings that can be taxed and which are now exempt from normal tax. Second, that it will put in the channels of trade greater purchasing power. Now let us analyze that for a moment. The total net income of all corporations in 1921 was nothing; in 1922 it was $4,400,000,000; in 1923 it was $5,800,000,000; in 1924 it was $5,000,000,000; in 1925 it was $7,000,000,000; in 1926 it was $6,800,000,000; in 1927 it was $5,900,000,000; in 1928 it was $7,600,000,000; in 1929 it was $8,100,000,000; in 1930 it was $1,400,000,000; in 1931 the loss was $3,100,000,000; in 1932 it was $5,400,000,000; and in 1933 it was $2,400,000,000.

To put it in another way, the total net income of all the corporations in the United States during this 13-year period was $41,100,000,000. The total dividends paid out was $50,700,000,000. In other words, the corporations of this country distributed to its stockholders $9,600,000,000 more money than they earned during the most prosperous period of our history.

How then can the argument be used, based upon this record, that in a like period in the future that a greater distribution of dividends will be made?

I want some proponent of the bill to answer that inquiry.

The claim is also made that the corporations in the past have paid out on an average of about 30 to 35 percent of their earnings. Let us analyze this statement for a moment.

In 1924 the corporations distributed 51.1 percent of their earnings; in 1925, 49.2 percent; in 1926, 54.8 percent; in 1927, 60.4 percent; in 1928, 57.1 percent; in 1929, 59.9 percent; in 1930, 87.3 percent; in 1931, 88.9 percent; in 1932, 94.7 percent; in 1933, 75.5 percent.

The average for the 10-year period has been 67.9 percent, showing about a 50-percent distribution in normal times, and from 76 percent to 95 percent in the depression period.

If you pass this tax bill and you do distribute more profits, they will not be able to pay out 76 percent or 80 percent or 95 percent when we have a period of hard times again.

If the new tax bill becomes a law, I want to know where the money is coming from to operate these plants. The record shows that all the corporations combined during the depression period lost, in 1931, over three billion; in 1932, over five billion; and in 1933, nearly two and one-half billion.

Ladies and gentlemen, we should not permit this legislation to be settled on the basis of our political affiliations. A tax bill that is against the general welfare of the public should be defeated regardless of its origin or regardless of its sponsors. It should be approved if it is equitably assessed and does no particular harm to the taxpayer.

On the other hand, if it "kills the goose that lays the golden egg", we should not vote for it to become a law. I hope that this bill can be decided upon its merits, regardless of party. We need a tax bill. We should have had a tax bill long ago, and I am for a tax bill that goes much further and one that will raise more revenue than this bill, but I cannot reconcile myself to a piece of legislation that I think will mean destruction of the business interests of this country, without which there can be no prosperity. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes. I do this to make a brief, dispassionate statement in answer to the impassioned statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK], with reference to his request for time to discuss this tax bill. A part of the statement is correct, and as to a part of it there is a misunderstanding, for I would not say that the gentleman would deliberately make a misstatement; I have too high a regard for the gentleman to make such an assertion. Sometime before the time for general debate was agreed upon, according to my recollection, before the bill was reported out of the committee, I received a letter from the gentleman from Ohio requesting that I give him 30 minutes' time to speak in opposition to the bill. At that time, as I stated, no agreement had been reached as to the time for general debate. Of course, I was not in position to say to anyone how much time he could have, not knowing how much time I could even have myself. When the time was fixed I thought I would answer his letter, after I had ascertained how much time would be allowed by the House. Later the time was arranged. After the time had been fixed by the House, I saw the gentleman on the floor of the House, and I forget whether he spoke first to me or whether I did to him. I think I approached him about the matter, about his writing to me requesting time. It was known then that there were to be 16 hours of general debate in which to discuss the bill, with the understanding, when the permission was obtained, that one-half of the time was to be occupied by those favoring the bill and one-half the time by those opposed to the bill, the time of those favoring the bill to be under my control and the time for those opposed to the bill to be in the control of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY]. We have 18 majority members on this side on the committee. Divide by 18 the 8 hours we have, and, if I am correct, it will give 25 minutes to each. How would I have been justified in giving any one member of the committee, especially not a member of the subcommittee, more than the average member of the committee, until I knew what requests would come from other members of the committee? I stated to the gentleman from Ohio in our conversation, because I was very careful to know what I was saying, when we talked about the time on the floor of the House, that inasmuch as there were only 8 hours on a side, I thought it would be better for him to get his time, if he was going to oppose the bill as he had written he was, from those who controlled the time in opposition to the bill. I did not refuse to let him have the time. I said I thought it would be better for him to get it from the gentleman from Massachusetts. I further stated to him that if there were Members on the minority side who desired to speak for the bill, if Mr. TREADWAY would give them time, then I would give him time.

That was the last I heard about it and the last said about it. In view of the fact that there are almost three times as many members on the majority as on the minority side of the committee, if anyone thinks that I should have taken more than his proportionate share and given him 30 minutes, then I suggest that that would have left only 24 minutes each to the other 17 members of the committee. Does any fair-minded man on this side or on the other side of the Chamber believe that I have done anything wrong about it? If he does, I will be glad to have him stand up and say so. Mr. Chairman, I have been chairman of this committee almost 4 years, and up to this time this is the first, so far as I know, that any member of the committee, majority or minority, has intimated that I have not been perfectly fair to every member of the committee and granted each every courtesy to which members were entitled.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BIERMANN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK] made the statement, if I heard him correctly, that if a corporation borrowed $50,000 now and during the year made a profit of $50,000, then in order to pay back that $50,000 to the bank it would have to borrow $21,250 to pay the taxes under this bill. Is that correct?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. No; I do not think so.

Mr. BIERMANN. What would be the situation of a company borrowing $50,000 and making a profit of $50,000 during the current year? What would that company have to pay in taxes?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Of course, I cannot at the moment answer the question without having opportunity to figure it and know what other factors would enter into it, but I feel reasonably sure that no situation similar to that would result.

Mr. Chairman, it has been rather interesting to observe the line of attack made by the opponents of this bill. These attacks have consisted of meaningless generalities. Nobody who has thus far spoken in opposition to the bill has undertaken to analyze the real purposes to be accomplished by the bill, or has in any sense shown wherein these are not worthy and desirable purposes.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Has anyone who has spoken for the bill analyzed more specifically and more correctly the bill than the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK], who has just concluded?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Yes. Of course, every man is entitled to his own opinion; but I think the analysis made of the bill yesterday by the chairman of the committee, and certainly by the chairman of the subcommittee, is far superior to any analysis or any consideration given by the gentleman from Ohio or any other Member who has spoken on the bill. [Applause.]

In passing, I might observe that I do not think our distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK] is in any sense justified in the remarks he made or the position he took toward the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. I feel that I voice the true sentiment and feeling of every member of that committee, both the majority and the minority sides, when I say there could not be found a man who has been fairer or more considerate of all members of that committee than our distinguished chairman the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON]. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], the ranking minority member, invited a comparison of the two reports filed on this bill—the majority and the minority reports. I cheerfully join with him in that invitation. Any fair-minded or reasonable person who will analyze the majority report and then analyze the minority report cannot fail to reach the conclusion that the majority report is far superior to the minority report, or that there is not any basis for comparison at all. The majority report on this bill undertakes to give an analysis of the bill itself for the convenience of the Members of the House who are to study the measure in determining their position on it. The minority report is simply a statement of meaningless generalities, and for all practical purposes is nothing more than a partisan political speech.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] who criticized the committee for not permitting the Republicans to write the bill, was short-sighted in his recollection with reference to his own party, when the tariff bill was written, when they not only excluded Democratic members from writing the bill, but brought it in under a closed rule, whereby no amendments could be offered to the bill on the floor of the House. The present bill is brought in under an open rule and is open to amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. This bill is here under the general rules of the House. No rule was applied for by the Ways and Means Committee.

Since the gentleman has mentioned that point, it might be worthy of some note to remind ourselves of the situation that actually existed during the consideration of the so-called Hawley-Smoot tariff bill. That was my first experience as a Member of Congress. I had just arrived as a Member of this body, serving in the special session called shortly after the inauguration of President Hoover. I shall never forget the impression that was made on me by the consideration given that bill. In the corridors of the old House Office Building, for a block in each direction from the old Ways and Means Committee room, you could not go along the hallway for the lobbyists swarming there to write a high protective-tariff bill in their own interests and for their own welfare.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That condition existed throughout the consideration of that bill.

I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. BACHARACH. Was the gentleman a member of the Ways and Means Committee at that time?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I was not a member of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. BACHARACH. I rather thought the gentleman was not, because the gentleman is not stating the facts, as a matter of fact.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Well, I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I know it is a fact.

Mr. BACHARACH. I happened to be a member of that committee at that time.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I happened to be a Member of Congress, and I passed there every day going to my office. I had to wind my way through those lobbyists swarming in the hall around the Ways and Means Committee room while you were preparing that bill. [Applause.]

Mr. BACHARACH. I am very sorry, because I have a great regard for the gentleman from Tennessee, but I want to say that, insofar as either the Democratic or Republican members of that committee were concerned, they were just exactly the same standard as they are today, and I do not think any member, be he Republican or Democrat, could have been influenced by a lobbyist, and I know that with Mr. Garner on that committee, no lobbyist would be allowed to go around near the Ways and Means Committee room or any other room. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Has the gentleman forgotten the fact that it was a matter of common knowledge and charged on every hand——

Mr. BACHARACH. Just the same as you are being charged today——

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That Joe Grundy, of Pennsylvania, and his cohorts controlled the writing of that bill? Has it also been forgotten that it was shown without doubt that a Republican Member of the Senate carried a lobbyist into the committee room with him when the bill was under consideration in the Senate?

Mr. BACHARACH. I wish the gentleman would name the lobbyist.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. It is a matter of common knowledge that former Senator Bingham, of Connecticut, was criticized generally for having done that. The gentleman's memory is far too short.

Mr. BACHARACH. No; no. My memory happens to be perfect, because I happened to be a member of that committee and the gentleman from Tennessee was not.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. But I happened to be a Member of Congress, and I am stating the impression that was made upon me.

Mr. BACHARACH. I think it is a serious reflection on the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee at that time, just the same as it is a serious reflection on the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee. I am in earnest about this bill. I do not believe any member of the Ways and Means Committee at any time during the 22 years I have been a Member of Congress could be influenced by any lobbyist or anyone else.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman is entitled to his opinion, but the fact remains the lobbyists were there in swarms, and everybody who was here then knows this to be true.

We have heard criticism of the method of drafting this bill, criticism because the majority members wrote the bill. The Republicans did the same thing on the tariff bill. The Democratic members were locked out, not allowed to participate at all. The Republicans wrote the bill.

The gentleman from New York criticized the bill because he said it was not fairly considered in the committee. The statement was made here yesterday by the distinguished gentleman from Washington, who was a member of the Ways and Means Committee during the consideration of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, that that bill was brought in and laid down on the table, and without reading a line or examining a word of it the Republican members voted it out. That is the situation.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. Does the gentleman dispute the fact there never was a hearing on this bill until it was laid before the committee 2 days before it came to the floor of the House?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I have not made any such statement as that.

Mr. REED of New York. The only hearings were upon a subcommittee report, a subcommittee unable to agree upon a bill.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The hearings were before the full committee.

Mr. REED of New York. Then the full committee came in and testimony was taken on a subcommittee report.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman's statement about the committee being unable to agree upon the report is not borne out by the subcommittee's report itself.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman's memory is too short, much shorter than I ever thought it was. The real truth is that the President's message was referred to the Ways and Means Committee. Within an hour after the committee received that message the chairman called a meeting, and the full committee met. After free and open discussion the matter was referred to the usual standing subcommittee on taxation. This subcommittee immediately began work and continued for 3 weeks, day after day and sometimes at night, and then formulated a report, made a written report to the full committee, covering nine-tenths of this bill as it appears here today. On that report hearings were held before the full committee, all members having free opportunity to participate in the hearings. Everybody was given an opportunity to appear and make any statement they saw fit as to their attitude on the proposals contained in this report.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. In a moment. On the tariff bill the gentleman talks about there was not any bill, there was not any report, there was not anything upon which hearings were held; and after the hearings were closed, the Republican members assembled behind closed doors and wrote the bill.

Mr. REED of New York. I accept the gentleman's apology, because he has stated exactly what I stated, that there was no public hearings held on this bill and nobody ever saw this bill until the day before it was introduced.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. What revenue bill has ever been prepared by Congress where the bill preceded the hearings?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Directing my remarks to the gentleman from New York, this revenue bill was drawn in the way all revenue bills are drawn; it is the only way a revenue bill ever has been drafted.

Mr. REED of New York. I am talking about this particular bill. The only statement I made which has been challenged is the fact, as I stated here, that no hearings were held upon this bill, that the bill was not introduced until just before it came to this House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will state the point of order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, my understanding of the rule governing the proceedings of the Committee in the consideration of this bill is that remarks shall be confined to the bill itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have waited 17 minutes to hear the gentleman from Tennessee discuss the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It has been the practice for more than 15 years, and according to Mr. Beaman, of the legislative counsel, there never has been a tax bill introduced first and hearings held upon the tax bill. We have pursued the usual course in this instance.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I repeat the point of order I made a moment ago. I am not deterred from repeating it by the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky. My point of order is that discussion must be confined to the bill. How long are we to wait until we get a discussion of it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee had yielded to the gentleman from Kentucky. The Chair assumes the gentleman from Kentucky has now finished.

The gentleman from Tennessee will proceed.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Whether or not Republican members of the subcommittee were present at these executive meetings of the committee——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, again I repeat my point of order. The gentleman's remarks are not relevant to the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

I have the right to discuss the bill as I think proper.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman overrules the point of order. The Chair thinks the argument is legitimate.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. My question is whether or not it is not a fact the Republican members of the subcommittee also participated in the preparation of this report?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That is absolutely true, and I invite the gentleman's attention to this language.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am acquainted with it, but I think it would be interesting for our colleagues to know what the language is.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The report made by the full subcommittee, consisting of four Democratic Members and three Republican Members, is this:

> This report embodies the recommendations of the subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee to the full committee with respect to the taxation of undistributed income of corporations, elimination of the present corporation tax, termination of the capital-stock tax and excise-profits tax, imposition of taxes on unjust enrichment occurring as a result of the nonpayment of excise taxes and related matters. The recommendations submitted herewith contemplate only such changes in the Revenue Act of 1934, as amended, as are necessary to carry out the policies herein set forth.

That is the report of the full subcommittee to the Ways and Means Committee, and there is not a line in it indicating there was any disagreement on the part of any minority Member, nor were there minority views filed. As I endeavored to point out a few moments ago, this bill as it stands today conforms to that subcommittee report in nine-tenths of its provisions.

We hear a lot of criticism raised here about the procedure employed for the consideration of this bill, which reminds me of the old saying that we have heard repeated so many times with reference to the experience of lawyers around the court room: "When the law is against you, talk about the facts. When the facts are against you, talk about the law. When both the law and the facts are against you, just raise hell in general." [Applause.]

That just exactly describes the attitude of the opponents of this bill. In their minority report they make a purely partisan and political speech, and that is all there is in it.

Mr. Chairman, this bill, as has already been indicated here, is in response to the message of the President of the United States sent to Congress on March 3. In that message the President stated:

> On January 3, 1936, in my annual Budget message to the Congress, I pointed out that without the item for relief the Budget was in balance. Since that time an important item of revenue has been eliminated through a decision of the Supreme Court, and an additional annual charge has been placed on the Treasury through the enactment of the Adjusted Compensation Payment Act.

I simply invite attention to the fact that all of the additional revenue provided in this bill is for the purpose of paying the farmers and the soldiers of this country. That is the entire situation that we have here today.

Mr. Chairman, there are $500,000,000 needed for the new farm program and $120,000,000 a year for payment of the adjusted-service certificates of the veterans. This makes $620,000,000, which is the permanent revenue provided for in this bill. In addition there are $517,000,000 needed for the outstanding contracts and obligations that the Government now owes to the farmers under the old A. A. A. Divided up into 3 years this would be $172,000,000 a year which is necessary to pay these farmers what the Government has contracted and agreed to pay.

In this bill we provide a windfall tax which is estimated to yield $100,000,000 and a capital stock tax which is estimated to yield $83,000,000. This makes a total of $183,000,000 to take care of the $172,000,000. The President says this revenue is needed. The opponents of this bill come along and in one breath argue that the bill will not produce any revenue, and then in the next breath they argue that it will destroy and ruin the business of the country. How in the world is it going to do both things at the same time? If it does not produce any revenue it cannot hurt anybody. If it does produce the revenue, why, of course, it will provide the funds that are needed as indicated in the President's message. Our distinguished friend from Ohio who preceded me in the discussion of this bill had much to say in general terms about the bill. My very warm personal feeling for him precludes me from saying anything further than to point out the fact that in this instance he is following his rather consistent course of opposing practically all measures proposed by this administration as well as most other measures that come along.

Now, let us bear in mind that the President said additional revenue was needed. Where should we look for this revenue? That occurs to me to be the first question that we should ask ourselves. I want to mention a few points in this connection. Does anybody think that the personal income-tax rates should be raised if by merely making the present rates effective, which means stopping their evasion, the additional revenues required may be obtained?

If the Government is going to get more revenue it has to come out of somebody's pocket. Unless Congress takes a part of his capital, no taxpayer can pay taxes except out of one of four kinds of receipts. That is, business profits, wages and salaries, interest and rents. It must be from one of those four sources. If any one of these four items is expanding rapidly at this time and the others are not, does not the avoidance of undue hardship require that the added tax burden be put upon that item which is increasing?

I understand there is a group of 161 corporations or industrial institutions, including railroads, utility companies, and so forth, used as representative by the Standard Statistics to indicate the trend of corporate profits. Without correction for seasonal variations, these 161 companies had earnings during the third quarter of 1935, 56 percent in excess of those for the like quarter of 1934, and the unrevised figures for their earnings during the fourth quarter of 1935 show an increase of more than 132 percent over their earnings for the fourth quarter of 1934. When corrected for seasonal variations, the corresponding percentages of increase are 69 percent and 117 percent. These figures indicate that the rising tide of corporate earnings is now flowing in full stream into the profit accounts of corporations.

I want to ask you whether there has been a corresponding and proportionate increase in wages and salaries, interest, and rents? Has it not always been true, just as it is now, that it is a considerable time after business profits increase before there is a corresponding and proportionate increase in wages and salaries, interest, and rent; and if that is so, would it not be premature to impose a heavier burden on personal incomes generally as opposed to a heavier tax on business profits as such? I would therefore submit that the plan presented by the President is the plan that should be adopted and it is to that source we should look for additional revenue.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. It must be borne in mind also that this measure is predicated upon statutory net income as distinguished from gross income.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. McCORMACK. And in no way disturbs the statutory deductions for depreciation, obsolescence, depletion, interest, and the other statutory deductions which in the case of one corporation with a gross income of $60,000,000 had $47,000,000 of statutory deductions, and after the payment of taxes and other expenses had a statutory net income of $1,000,000 plus. They had a gross income of $60,000,000, which did not include the operating expenses, salaries of employees, and so forth, for the year, indicating the liberalness of the statutory deductions which are permitted under the present law and would continue under the proposed law.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct. I cannot, in the time allotted to me, cover all the points that might be of interest, based on the observation made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, but I would invite the attention of the members of the Committee to page 22 of the hearings, which gives a rather comprehensive statement of the situation now existing with reference to corporations taking deductions for depletion, depreciation, and obsolescence; and it will be borne in mind that this is not disturbed in any sense by this bill. The corporation continues to enjoy all of the advantages and opportunities that exist under present law, so far as these deductible items are concerned.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. On that point, between the period 1926 and 1929 there was 16.2 billion dollars written off in depreciation and depletion; between 1930 and 1933 there was 16.4 billion dollars written off in depreciation and depletion; and in the last period, 1930 to 1933, the amount allowed for depreciation and depletion was 49.9 percent of the net income for that period.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That is true, and they are the facts that are shown by this statement in the hearings to which I invited attention a moment ago.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. FORD of California. Has it not been stated by the opposition repeatedly that this measure will not raise any more revenue than we are getting at the present time?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. FORD of California. Then why are they opposing it?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I made the observation a few moments ago that I did not see how it could do both things at the same time.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. With reference to the statement just made with respect to credits and deductions, is there anything in the bill that prevents an individual from deducting all of the taxes paid to units of government, such as State, county, and city taxes?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Oh, there is no change from existing law on that point in this measure.

Mr. CRAWFORD. There has been some discussion of that in the newspapers, and I was just wondering if anything of that sort had been included.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. No; there is no such change in this bill. The present law is not affected in any sense in that respect.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Tennessee 15 additional minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that this new bill would not raise any more revenue than existing law?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Certainly the gentleman could not have understood me to say that.

Mr. MICHENER. I thought in answer to the question of the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD] the gentleman made that statement.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. No; the gentleman from California asked me if that statement had not been repeatedly made by the opponents of the bill, and I answered that it had. I have heard it repeatedly said here that the bill will not produce any revenue—in fact, it is so stated in the minority views—and at the same time they say it will wrack and ruin the business of the country. I am unable to see how, if it does not produce any revenue, it is going to place such a burden upon people that they will be wracked and ruined.

Mr. MICHENER. If you put them out of business entirely, regardless of tax, that would be the effect. However, my question was based on the fact that I got from what the gentleman stated that the real purpose of this bill is to change the system; that the reform or change of the system is the primary purpose of the bill, and secondary to that comes the matter of revenue.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will not take any more of my time.

Mr. MICHENER. Am I right or wrong?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I will answer the gentleman in this way: The title of this bill reads "A bill to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes." If there ever was a true statement in the title of any bill, it is the statement here that the object is to raise revenue and equalize taxation. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Some reference was made in the previous discussion by the gentleman from Ohio about the tax that the Ford Motor Co. might or might not pay. Am I correct in my understanding that in the event the Ford Motor Co. next year should make $15,000,000 as a net profit and pay out that sum in dividends, the corporation itself would pay no tax under the present bill?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It should be stated there that the tax under existing law—the maximum rate—is 15 percent, and there is the capital-stock tax and the excess-profits tax, and of course, the rate upon the money in the hands of the shareholders of the Ford Motor Co. would reach the high surtax brackets and much more money would come into the Treasury than under the existing corporate tax.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Now, the gentleman from Ohio to whom reference has been made also said something about a man by the name of David Coyle being the one who proposed this measure. With all due deference to the gentleman, as one member of the subcommittee who, I think, has been as attentive as any man could be in an effort to discharge the duties imposed, one who has been in every conference, I think, that has been held on this bill, and who has participated as freely as anybody else who has had a part in the consideration of this bill, I want to say to the gentleman that I never heard of the man Coyle before in my life until the gentleman mentioned him here today.

I can say that he had nothing to do with this bill. The gentleman says that we ought to write our own bill. If there was ever a bill presented to this House for consideration that was completely written in every detail, every question of policy determined by the committee in charge, it is true in this instance. Your committee has been laboring for 8 weeks, day and night, and has brought this bill here as a product of the committee. We present it to you as the best we could accomplish under our efforts.

Now, I want to touch briefly upon some of the provisions of this bill and again remind you of the principle upon which this bill rests.

As was stated by the chairman of the committee, the bill is based upon justice and equality, and certainly a sounder principle cannot be found for any bill than that.

There are two important points that should be borne in mind in connection with this bill. The first is that all existing surpluses and reserves of corporations are not taxed; they remain in the future as they exist now.

It should be borne in mind that under this plan all existing corporation taxes are repealed. That is, the corporation income tax from 12½ to 15 percent. Capital-stock tax, $1.44 a thousand, and the present excess-profit taxes are repealed, and this new system is inaugurated in place of them.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Am I confused in this? Is it not true that the accumulated surplus prior to 1935 will enter into this tax picture insofar as dividends paid from excess earnings in 1934 first and in 1933 second?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman is not exactly accurate.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The difference carried over looks to the future and does not look back into the past years.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The word "preceding" refers to the future?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. You are dealing with the taxable year next before. For instance, running along until 1938 you have a dividend distribution, and the carry-over from 1936 and the difference between the dividend declared and your adjusted income is a credit for 1937 and 1938. If you are dealing with 1938, you take 1936 first.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I was referring to 1933 and 1934.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK] made the statement, as I got it, that under existing law there is no tax avoidance, no tax evasion of any consequence by reason of enormous surpluses being piled up. Of course, he is just mistaken in that. The real fact is that $1,600,000,000 in taxes yearly are being evaded through that method, and that is just the amount of the tax, which means something like four or five billion dollars a year that are being piled up in enormous surpluses in corporations throughout the country. This bill simply presents this situation. In the future, as in the past, a corporation may have all the surplus and all the reserves that it wants to have. It can conduct its business affairs as its business judgment dictates to it, and this tax plan simply provides that whatever net income the corporation has, its earnings and profits shall go through the tax mill just like your money and mine. I am unable to see that there is anything unfair or unreasonable about that. Instead of allowing enormous surpluses to be piled up in corporations, in order to keep the individual shareholders in closely held corporations from having to pay individual income tax, that would force them up into the high surtax brackets, they just keep piling it up in surpluses in the corporation—a pure tax evasion, purely for the purpose of avoiding the payment of individual income tax. That is what this bill meets; that is the situation that is corrected by it. I am unable to see how there is anything unfair or unreasonable about that. On the contrary, I think it is the very essence of fairness and sound common sense for us to provide that the corporations of the country, which are artificial persons, recognized in law as such, with the right to sue and be sued, when they have earnings and profits, clear money, shall pay a tax on it as you and I do.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. This will simply close up the loopholes so they cannot evade the payment of a tax?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That is the purpose. Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said about complications presented here. Of course, any tax bill has to be complicated in its phraseology. There never has been one presented here that was not complicated. I invite any fair person to compare this bill in its terms and phraseology with the existing income-tax law, especially the surtax brackets. It is not, as I say, anything like as complicated as that is. You simply ask the corporations two questions at the end of the year under this plan. The first is, What was your net income; what did you make? If they answer that, then the next question is, What did you do with it; did you pay it out in dividends to your stockholders? If you did, you do not owe us a dime; but if you did not pay it out to your stockholders, then you owe us a tax on it. That is all it means. It is based on the principle of fairness and equality to all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Some reference has been made to the 248 pages of the bill. In connection with that, is it not a fact that most of the contents of this bill are the present law which was necessary to incorporate in there?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That is true. This bill is prepared just like every other tax bill has been prepared since 1922. The new law is superimposed upon existing law.

This bill neither repeals nor amends the 1934 Revenue Act. It is made effective, as is shown right here in the beginning of the bill:

> The provisions of this bill shall apply only to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1935.

Of course, the former law applies to former tax years.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. FULLER. The statement has been made here, especially by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], describing a man named Coyle as one who drew this bill. Is it not a fact that this bill was drawn absolutely solely and entirely by the gentlemen who sit in back of the committee, the legal experts of our committee, together with the legal experts from the Treasury Department, in conjunction with the Democratic members of the committee?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That is correct. I ask your indulgence again just for a moment to point out a few illustrations of the real situation we have here so far as this new system is concerned. Take, for instance, the treatment that is given here to the corporations of the country. They are divided into two groups—corporations with an adjusted net income of $10,000 or less, and corporations with an adjusted net income of $10,000 a year or more. For the corporations with $10,000 a year or less in adjusted net income, schedule no. 1 of rates applies. The statement has been made here by the opponents of the bill that a tax is levied upon a surplus of the corporation. That is not the situation at all. The tax rate applies to the adjusted net income of the corporation for the taxable year.

The rate is measured by the amount of surplus they retain. Just as an illustration, refer on page 15 of the bill to schedule no. 1. For instance, a corporation which makes $10,000 in statutory net income, wants to retain 10 percent of that in surplus; that would be $1,000. Then if you look at the schedule you will see that corporation would pay a tax on its net income of $10,000 of 1 percent. That is $100 tax. Under existing law it pays $1,500 tax. That is just $1,400 saving to that corporation.

Now, go on down and take a corporation, for instance, that wants to retain 30 percent of its net income; it would pay a tax of 7½ percent on the $10,000 net income, whereas under existing law it pays a tax of 15 percent. That is just one-half, under this bill, that it has to pay under existing law. If you go on down through, it shows the effect that the treatment provided here gives to the various corporations of the country.

It should be remembered that of the 257,000 corporations of this country showing statutory net income, 214,000 of them come under schedule I, the smaller schedule of rates, and only 43,000 of the corporations of the country come under the other schedule. That gives you some indication of the fairness that prevails throughout the treatment of this entire subject.

Just a moment to briefly touch upon the so-called unjust enrichment tax.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK] is opposed to that. Certain Members of the minority are opposed to that. How any man can justify a position in opposition to that is more than I can understand. The principle involved is simply this: Where the processors throughout the country collected a tax from their customers and failed to pay it to the Government, we simply provide here that an income tax of 80 percent shall be levied against that. There was $180,000,000 impounded in the courts under the processing tax, and the whole amount is about $253,000,000 of this unjust enrichment, the processors throughout the country passing the tax on and the consumers having to pay, and still they did not pay it to the Government. We took the position that if anybody collected a tax and passed it on to the consumer, they should pay that to the Government. Of course, the consumer is the one who is really entitled to it, but obviously we could not give it to him. We think the next best thing is to give it to the consumers' government, the General Government. The Government should receive 80 percent of this money. Some of them took the position that we should not even try to get that money. It should be borne in mind if the processor did not pass the tax on and collect it from his customers, he does not owe a dime.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. In the event of a pork packer, for example, who did not pass the tax on but who is nevertheless hopelessly in the red as a result of the whole proceeding, is there anything to protect that man? I am seeking information.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I think he is amply protected.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If he is in the red and does not make a net profit on the business, if he does not make any income on the transactions involved, there is no tax. If you multiply nothing by 80 percent, of course the tax is nothing.

Mr. HARLAN. Is the tax based on 80 percent of the unjust profits, or is it on the income?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It is the unjust profits counted in with his business.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The tax is 80 percent against this income derived as unjust enrichment. That is what it is.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. Why should not the Government retax the whole amount instead of 80 percent?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Well, we knew they had some expenses in the collection and handling of the processing tax. It was shown to us that some firms claimed their expenses amounted to about 13 percent. In addition to that, we had involved the legal question that we could not completely confiscate.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it not a fact that there will be an adjustment made on this particular phase of the tax bill?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. And then 80 percent after the adjustment is made?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Eighty percent after the adjustment is made. Only the so-called windfall tax, the unjust enrichment that those men received, to which this 80 percent applies.

Mr. HOUSTON. And 20 percent is ample to take care of all expenses—bookkeeping and all expenses incidental to the collection of the money?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. We think so. In other words, what we hoped to accomplish was simply this: The ideal we had before us was that no man in this country should be enriched by one penny by reason of collecting this tax and passing it on to his customers and failing to pay it to the Government and at the same time no man should be caused to suffer a loss by reason of the processing taxes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. It is provided in this bill for people throughout the country to receive refunds on the floor stocks that they had on hand at the date of the Supreme Court decision invalidating the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

When the processing tax originally was imposed and became effective they had, of course, to collect floor-stock taxes from the merchants throughout the country who had stocks of goods on hand. This amounted to about $98,000,000. It was provided in the Agricultural Adjustment Act that when the processing tax was terminated a refund should be made for stocks then on hand. The tax was not terminated by proclamation of the Secretary of Agriculture as provided in that act because the decision of the Supreme Court intervened. The committee took the position it was only fair to refund these floor-stock taxes, for the merchants were entitled to them just the same as if the act had been terminated by proclamation of the Secretary of Agriculture rather than by the decision of the Court; and that is what we are trying to do here.

This entire bill is based upon what we conceive to be the principle of fairness and equality to everybody. It yields the revenue our great President says is necessary. All along we have heard the hue and cry, "Balance the Budget!" But now the opportunity is offered; those who raised the hue and cry are bending every energy and exerting every effort to defeat the very purpose we are trying to accomplish. [Applause.]

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY].

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, if I were to follow the path of least resistance and were to suit my own convenience, I would refrain from taking any part in the discussion of this tax bill, for to me all matter and things pertaining to taxes are anathema. Six years' experience as commissioner of taxes of the State of Vermont in the enforcement and administration of general, corporate, income, and inheritance tax laws, and several years' experience on the other side of the fence, as tax attorney for corporate interests, is my excuse for whatever I may have to say with reference to this bill. I do not intend to take very much time, inasmuch as obviously there is nothing to be gained thereby, nor in prolonging the agony preceding the birth of this brain child, ill-begotten, under circumstances which certainly reflect no credit on its parents.

The long-awaited New Deal tax bill has arrived! It is 248 pages long, and, as I see it, covers more complexities, intricacies, and involved situations with respect to taxation than any other measure ever introduced in the history of Federal taxation. Sixteen hours has been allotted for discussion of this measure on this floor. I venture to assert that there are many practical-minded tax administrators who have handled the business of revenue collecting for many of the several States in this Union who would agree with me that three times that number of hours would not be sufficient in which to point out the fallacies involved in, and the impractical situations which will arise under, this proposed law, which it is hoped and expected will be passed at the end of this week, or certainly by the end of next.

This bill might be called "An act to discourage small business, to encourage monopoly, and to prevent competition."

It is aimed not at the large corporation which has accumulated an adequate surplus but at the small one which wishes to save that it may expand; not at the man who has reached the high places, but at the man who is battling his way up.

The business of this country is done by corporations. Half a million of them filed returns for 1933 and only 109,000 reported net income. And of those more than 90,000 made less than $10,000 net income in the year.

This is a country of corporations, but it is not a country of big corporations. Rather it is a country of small corporations eager to grow, to give more work to more men and women, pay better dividends, to build new plants. And it is at the owners of these corporations, ambitious men, thrifty men, that this bill is aimed.

But I heard someone say, "This bill is not aimed at little business; it is aimed at the big fellow, the corporation that has a surplus of $50,000,000 or $100,000,000. That is too much; he ought to be made to disgorge."

Experience, Mr. Chairman, has conclusively and undeniably demonstrated one thing: That is, that people will avoid or escape, whenever it is within their power to do so, the payment of any tax, be it reasonable or unreasonable, justified or unjustified, and that the severe penalty, the real burden, will fall upon those who should but cannot escape.

I tell you that if the truth were known and told there are, according to the figures I have seen—and they should be and are reliable and authoritative—approximately 300 corporations out of the 600 in the class that earned a million dollars and more in 1934, which 300 under this bill will pay not more than 50 percent as much taxes as in 1934.

Then, again, from 140 to 170 of the million-dollar profit-earning corporations which are paying taxes under the existing law will escape the necessity of paying taxes under the proposed law by distributing all their earnings, and consequently paying no taxes.

These figures are based on reports made to the United States Treasury by the corporations themselves and will have to be substantiated by the Treasury from its record, for they are correct.

I say to you that this is a punitive measure which at excessively high rates undertakes allegedly to tax the surplus earnings of corporations, yet designedly is not in reality an attempt to tax but to prevent the accumulation of surpluses. It is a threat and an effort to compel the distribution in dividends of all the earnings accumulated just as fast as the earnings are made. So far as those large corporations that are reached by it are concerned this law would be disastrous; the small struggling corporation is strangled in its infancy; the growing and thrifty young business is anesthetized; the healthy and prosperous industry seeking to expand and to develop is put to death by the lethal weapon concealed in this plan for its economic murder.

I reassert that it is at the class of small corporations ambitious to grow and thrifty enough to save in order that more work may be given to more men and that their plants may be expanded, and that a surplus may be accumulated, in order that dividends may be paid, that this vicious measure is aimed.

The truth is that this bill is not aimed at the existing surpluses at all. It will not touch the fifty millions and the hundred millions. Those companies will continue to hold their surpluses. It is the small company that wants to build up that will be the victim.

Here is a case in point. An editor in a small community has had three or four pretty hard years. He has made enough to keep his family going, but his plant has deteriorated. He needs a new linotype. He has got to consider rebuilding his press. He figures that if he could spend a few thousand dollars he could get some extra commercial business as well as turning out a better-looking paper.

His business improves, but he continues to content himself with $50 a week. At the end of a year he finds he has a net income of $10,000. He figures to set aside as surplus what is left after taxes are paid and put it into bettering his plant. He can do better by paying cash and he is shopping around for new equipment. Then he comes to look into his little corporation's taxes under this proposed bill and he discovers that he cannot do what he wants to. At the proposed corporate tax rates he can only put into reserve $7,030 and must pay a tax of $2,970 as against a corporate income tax of about $1,500.

Here is a business eager to get ahead, to build up an industry of which its owner could be proud, to make a better newspaper for his community. He is willing to deny himself to accomplish those ends. And what happens? His Government proposes to tax him more if he wants to save and get ahead than if he proposes to distribute and spend all his earnings. And his desire to save is not a desire to hoard. He would put back the money into industry where it would give further employment.

The Treasury has an answer to this objection to the proposed tax. It proposes that the company declare a dividend and that the stockholders with those funds purchase new stock thus bringing the money back into the company. But what a complicated method and one that seems to imply that the stockholders must all think alike.

Let us take another actual case to show how this measure would hit the progressive, young business. Three young men own all the stock in a small engineering company. Two are skilled engineers; the third has contributed a modest capital. The two are quite content to lead a furnished-room and lunch-counter life for a while if they can feel that they are going ahead. And they are. Their little business will make, they think, $15,000 net this year and they would like to put it all above the corporation income tax back into the business, but can they under this proposed law? Not a bit of it. They would have to pay $6,375 in order to save $8,625 if they paid no dividends.

Suppose they followed the Government suggestion to pay it all out in dividends and sell themselves more stock. But suppose the one who contributed capital will not agree? And what about the complicated problems of registering a new issue? What will these young and ambitious men do? One answer is surrender their corporate charter and start anew as a partnership. But the man who put in the capital may say: "No; I'm not going to assume the liability involved. I'm willing to risk what I invested but no more." Yet we may see a great shifting of small corporations to a partnership basis.

One more instance and I take this from the statement before the Ways and Means Committee of Royal Little, vice president of the Franklin Rayon Co., of Providence. He started in business with the corporate structure of a defunct company with no capital but with the idea that he was going into the business of processing rayon yarn. He got $10,000 from a bank because a friend endorsed the corporation's note and with one room and four employees the business began. First year sales were $75,000 and a profit resulted. Did the stockholders get it? Not a cent. That wicked thing called a surplus went for more machinery. By 1928 the company was doing a business of a million and employing 100 persons. Still the stockholders had no dividend. That year they merged with a competitor and wanted some outside capital. This was in a year when the banks were supposed to be lending money to anyone who wanted it, but no bank would touch their proposition. To quote Mr. Little:

> The only intelligent excuse * * * came from one house who said, "Your merger looks like two drunks trying to help each other home."

Mr. Little raised the money, a good part of it by his personal note to a bank. The company has steadily grown until in 1935 it had sales of $5,000,000 and employed 500 persons. Rayon is a new industry in which machinery and methods are constantly improving and always the company has been ready to meet conditions largely from its earnings.

I cannot do better than quote two paragraphs from Mr. Little:

> Under the new tax proposals apparently everything which we have done in the past has been wrong. Should we have been prevented by tax legislation such as this from building up our business? I assure you that neither I nor anyone else could duplicate in the future what we have done in the past if the penalty on undistributed net earnings now proposed is enacted into law. * * * I ask you gentlemen in all fairness to study the facts in our case, which is typical of many others, and tell us whether you honestly feel that I am an enemy of society for what I have done.

I have said that this tax bill is aimed at small business. One more quotation from Mr. Little:

> Selfishly looking at our own point of view, the Franklin Rayon Corporation would not oppose this tax because I know that no one else could build up a competitive enterprise on as favorable a basis as I have done it, if this tax law goes through.

Not only is this tax bill aimed at small business; it is aimed at one of the fundamentals on which the United States has been built, the encouragement of competition for the prevention of monopoly.

Old, well-established organization, well-entrenched financially, will find themselves in a far better economic position as compared with less well financially entrenched existing companies, or with those new companies which seek to start in business. As Charles J. Bullock said in the Atlanta convention of the National Tax Association in 1917, which I attended in my capacity as tax commissioner for the State of Vermont:

> * * * if you want a tax that will tend to entrench in its dominating position a monopolistic or quasi-monopolistic large industry, you cannot devise a better tax.

This is the status of the measure that is now before us, and will be the result of its enactment, if it is enacted in its present form.

We do not prevent monopoly so much by passing laws as we do by permitting, even encouraging, small business to grow bigger, to try out new ideas.

We see a great industry with branches spread throughout the country, and we forget that it began in a cross-roads blacksmith shop where a man in a leather apron beat out an iron plow. We see a great department store covering a city block, and we forget that its start was a pack which a peddler carried from door to door. And, more than all, we forget that what has happened may and will happen again unless by such legislation as this, business is made static. The great merchant is not afraid of his established competitor whose ways are his ways, who can be met in a field every foot of which they both know; he is afraid of the little fellow who has just started a business whose capital is 10 percent money and 90 percent ideas.

Westinghouse and General Electric may find themselves less concerned with the competition one with the other than with a new industry provided this bill does not choke him in his childhood.

We have heard much talk of the power of entrenched wealth. What is this bill except to still further entrench, to fortify, wealth. A great company with fifty million surplus, unaffected by this tax, has little to fear from an invader deprived of his right to husband his resources.

We profess to fear the control of this country by big business, yet we propose a measure to keep little business little.

We debate measures to prevent price fixing, yet we plan to pass a bill which will make it increasingly possible to maintain arbitrary prices. The enemy of unreasonable prices is competition, the very competition that this bill is planned to kill. There is no better friend of labor than capital flowing into new enterprises and expansion of old ones.

I represent a constituency that is and through the years has been fortunate in having many small industrial enterprises located therein—small communities have been built around the one or two small industries in these little settlements, and the people who live there are dependent upon the little industries for their well-being. It is their interest that I am endeavoring to represent, when I rise to point out the added difficulties with which they will be confronted under this tax program that has been proposed. It is they on whom the brunt of taxation falls; it is their money that supports the Government and that is being spent by the Government in the course of its ordinary and so-called extraordinary expenditures. It is their resources that must be husbanded, for they and their counterparts throughout the country constitute the backbone, the lifeblood of our Nation.

I cannot help alluding to the fact that those charged with the responsibility of drafting and the income of this measure have not presented a fiscal program, nor supported one, which even indicates a desire now or in any way indicates a determined purpose on their part to balance the Budget. Get more money in order that more may be spent is the actuating motive. No word or thought is heard or apparent with respect to the reduction of expenditures in national spending with these tax proposals. If such a situation obtained, one might approach consideration of this bill in an entirely different state of mind. But, Mr. Chairman, we are confronted with the fact that no tax plan can be conceived or evolved or contrived by human beings which will provide or even begin to furnish or supply the necessary revenue to meet and to cover the existing and constantly increasing governmental expenditures. When you are spending two dollars for every one you earn, you cannot catch up with that program by choking to death the goose that lays the golden egg—and I fear I say "goose" advisedly.

Mr. Chairman, committees and theorists may write tax laws until doomsday which theoretically will produce the desired result. It is a pretty picture which figures make. They look good on paper. But let me tell you that the man who has to enforce and administer these dreams finds them most impractical, unenforceable, and inadequate and absolutely impossible of enforcement or administration by reason of the human factor and the consequent obstacles, which factor and which obstacles the theorists do not see and the practical administrator and enforcer of the law cannot overcome. This proposed tax bill is exactly that kind of a dream—impractical, unenforceable, and unworkable. I fear that it is going to be enacted into law, and in substantially the form in which we are now considering it; but I wish to say to you—and I am not alibiing or qualifying—I wish to say that the bill will not produce the revenue it seeks to cover into the Treasury, and that, moreover, because of its complexity and intricacies and its nonunderstandable and nonconstrued provisions, it will add confusion worse confounded to an already complex and nonunderstood tax situation, and will further retard recovery, increase unemployment, and contribute to a continuation of that uncertainty and chaotic condition with which business is confronted; initiative strangled; confidence lacking—for which situation those now in charge of the fiscal fallacies of this Government are responsible and must answer.

Those who are operating under the present Federal tax law tell me that the regulations with which they are now surrounded are so complex as to lead nowhere and to arrive at the same place. The statute itself is not susceptible of reasonable interpretation, is beyond comprehension, and is always ambiguous. There is no certainty whatever. Nobody knows what it is all about. Tax liabilities are unascertainable, and no one can compute them, for there is no finality. Regulations are amended, rulings are reversed, retroactive provisions adopted, litigation delayed and prolonged, all at the expense and confusion of the taxpayer. I doubt if there is anybody who can tell me how to compute taxable net income under the provisions of this proposed law.

If it would accomplish a major tax reform—and at this point I wish to say that I recognize that such a reform is sadly needed and that there do exist inequalities in the tax system that should be corrected—if it would accomplish a major tax reform, one that would iron out the inequalities, one that would stop the leaks that exist, one that could be administered properly due to its fairness and simplicity, it should have our wholehearted support. This bill is so remotely removed from any semblance of simplicity, however, that it is and has been labeled "the most complicated piece of legislation in the last 50 years", and a Washington service is authority for the statement that the theory back of the measure is now being discussed algebraically. I have alluded to the fact that the task of administering the tax will be immeasurably enlarged by the new method. It seems to me that this is only too evident on its face to need further emphasis to be there placed.

Some of the practical questions which arise were suggested to the committee during the hearings.

First. Is a dividend taxable if paid in scrip, in an enforceable promise to pay, or in bonds?

Second. Is a dividend taxable if paid out of paid-in surplus, out of a depreciation or depletion reserve in excess of cost, or which is subsequently adjusted downward?

Third. Is a dividend paid when the check is mailed, or must it be received by the stockholder?

Fourth. Is the dividend "taxable" if paid to a stockholder exempt from Federal tax?

Fifth. What is a bank or a trust company and when is it "bona fide operated"?

Sixth. Must the taxpayer compute "undistributed net income" by algebraic formulas, using two unknowns?

Seventh. How much delay will be involved in valuing property distributed as a dividend in kind, and what rules of valuation will be applied?

Eighth. What is the law with respect to the propriety of a dividend, in the case of a separate corporation and in the case of a consolidated group of corporations?

Ninth. What are the liabilities of directors whose corporations incur the terrific penalties, or, to avoid them, pay out in dividends cash needed in the business?

Tenth. What contracts are to be understood to be definite prohibitions upon dividend payments?

These are only a few of the innumerable practical problems which confront the taxpayer, and as the years go by many more will arise to trouble his dreams.

Why, Mr. Chairman, this House ought to have 30 days in which carefully to consider this bill and its provisions, many of which I make bold to say are neither understood nor comprehended, nor the effects foreseen by the members of the committee who have reported the bill. The graduated tax on corporate net incomes, which is designed to force out company earnings to stockholders and so increase income tax yield to the Treasury, to which I have referred is the major feature of this bill. It imposes an unbearable tax burden upon undistributed net income, for net income has to be undistributed unless it is paid out as a taxable dividend within the time limit as provided in the act.

As a practical proposition no one in the Revenue Department or Treasury Department or anywhere else can compute conclusively the taxable net income of any corporation of any size before the expiration of 2½ months from the end of the corporation's taxable year. The trouble with that is, from a taxable standard, that they will not have the tax returns on which to base their computations, for they will not be filed until after those 2½ months, and after they are filed the litigation and the contest between the taxpayer and the Treasury and the Revenue Department may go on for years over the question as to what constitutes taxable net income. This is the practical problem. And if taxation is anything it is practical when it comes to the matter of enforcing or administering the law.

Mr. Chairman, if the Treasurer or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue cannot compute taxable net income after years of consideration, and many of the cases are decided against the Commissioner, it is farcical, laughable, if it were not so serious, to suggest that the corporation itself could be expected to compute its net income within 2½ months. But that is not the end of it. Not only must a corporation determine its earnings and its profits, compute and declare and ascertain its net income and its adjusted net income, and all within the 2½ months provided by this act, but it must declare and pay taxable dividends. Well, in short, this is impossible, and the provisions of the act attempt to compel the impossible.

This bill proposes a revenue increase through temporary retention of the capital stock and excess-profits taxes with new levies on foreign corporations and alien stockholders. It sets up a "windfall" tax of 80 percent to try to get back over a hundred million dollars of the processing taxes impounded. It would restrict the evasion of new taxes by corporations using incorporate dividends. It provides for a 15-percent flat tax on banks and insurance companies; establishes at 22½ percent the rate of the flat tax on corporation earnings used to pay debts, and at 15 percent the rate on foreign corporations in receivership in the United States, and repeals the excess-profits tax after the present taxable year.

These are only a few of the things it undertakes to do, many of which it most certainly will not accomplish. However, there is one thing of which I am absolutely sure and certain, and I am not the son of a prophet, but experience is the best teacher I know. This bill will seriously impair the financial strength of corporations, depreciate their value of bonds and notes and their evidence of indebtedness, increase inequities and impose discriminatory taxes, increase complexities and uncertainties in the computation of tax liabilities, subject corporations to severe penalties by reason of circumstances beyond their control; result in duplicate and multiple taxation of the same income, and, in short, have a substantially adverse effect on the economic and business conditions of the country.

There is no pretense made that the program prescribed even undertakes to balance the regular Budget. No practical-minded man can figure out how it will produce anything like the estimated revenue. Moreover, this measure undertakes to overturn the whole present structure of corporate taxation. And in a few minutes, figuratively speaking, undertakes to remold and remake a system which it has taken years to develop.

This can be done in the committee room and on paper and in the Treasury, but when the day of reckoning comes the effectual obstacles involved in enforcement and administration of a revenue law present problems which are insurmountable, cannot be overcome, and then the brain child of the theorists might as well be dead, for it will never grow up, and it will horribly fail to measure up to the standard set for it by its fond parents.

Time does not permit me to discuss this bill by item or section or subject. I am, however, most concerned with its administration, by reason of my own experience and difficulties encountered in my attempts to put in action the ideas put on paper by theorists. I am going to say to you without knowing, that what happens will justify my statement and that is this: The administrative difficulties which are involved in this bill are such in themselves and sufficient in themselves to wreck the measure, however good it otherwise might be, and because it is unenforceable, unworkable, and impractical, if for no other reason—and there are many reasons—it is unsound, will be ineffective, might as well not be passed, and therefore should not be.

Its purpose and intent is to force distribution of corporate surpluses and in this it will fail. It seeks to produce a given amount of revenue and any schoolboy can ascertain the inadequacy of the plan. It is easy to be captious and I long ago learned it was not smart to be destructively critical. So I say seriously that from my knowledge of State and Federal taxation this tax bill from the standpoint of intricacy and complexity has not now and never had a rival. The obvious mazes through which the financial and tax experts will lead the businessman, who will be compelled to seek their aid, will lead the businessman to the verge of bankruptcy to keep him from which, and with the aid of whom, even then the road will be a hard one.

The harder a law is to construe and the more difficult it is to interpret, the more opportunity there is afforded for evasion. Tax legislation should be reduced to the lowest possible denominator and be written in the simplest possible terms. It has been well said: That our Federal tax laws have become increasingly complex, and the climax of legislative fullness appears to have been reached in this latest legislative tax program.

Now, let us be honest with the people. Nobody knows how much this bill will produce, but everybody thinks it will be at least $334,000,000 shy of meeting the President's demands. A million dollars used to be a lot of money, but we talk and speak another language in the trance that is on us today. A million dollars is a lot of money back where I come from, and its reckless spending I propose to object to so long as I can stand here and talk. Why not stop spending recklessly for a while instead of crucifying the body politic in an attempt to extract one more agonized drop of revenue blood to be spent for the unwise and temporary relief of a populace drunk with injections of panaceas, which are but a delusion and a snare, and contribute to a recovery as unreal and temporary as an opium eater's dream? It is time to wake up.

This bill, in its last analysis, is "a direct threat to the security of American business, employment, and investments." Somewhere I read a most elucidating statement to the effect that never before had any President felt it necessary to promise a breathing spell to business. Think that over! A breathing spell to business promised by the Chief Executive! He who would grant the breathing spell assumes thereby the responsibility of choking business to death. This is incontrovertible and the horrible truth. But the breathing spell is over before it was ever begun and we are considering the most complicated, confusing, and extraordinary tax bill "that ever bedeviled a Congress eager to call it a day and go back home." As I have said before so I see someone else thinks, namely, that—

> As to the chief purpose of this piece of patchwork legislation there can be no dispute. That is perfectly plain. The difficulty will come in administering it. No Representative, even if he has waded through the 236 pages of printed text, boasts that he knows how it can be made to work. Nor can anybody be found who will do more than guess at the revenue it may produce.
> But from Speaker to page boy everybody is aware that this alleged tax bill is just another New Deal bludgeon for business. It strikingly illustrates the dictum that the power to tax is the power to destroy. The N. R. A. fixed hours and wages, but if a corporation, thus hedged and hampered, did manage somehow to wangle a net income, nobody in Washington stood ready to dictate how it should be distributed.
> Even before the new dealers felt the lash of the courts and while they were looking upon the Constitution as a sort of successor to the one-horse shay, the directors of corporations were allowed to use their own judgment in the matter of dividend payments and additions to reserves kept for emergencies or purposes of expansion. Considering the lengths to which the New Deal went in the direction of regimenting business, large and small, it is odd that they should have kept hands off the corporations' fiscal policies for so long.
> There are plenty of corporations that will suffer no financial harm, at least immediately, from this scheme to tax their total net incomes according to the amount they divert to reserves instead of to dividends. There are many stockholders who may believe they will profit from the forced payment of dividends which might more prudently, in numerous cases, be left to strengthen their companies' financial structure.

But the outstanding objection to this "dangerous measure", as a leading Democratic newspaper terms it, is the overriding of corporation managements by a hard-and-fast rule backed up by a punitive tax. Some will try to pay the tax and maintain what they consider necessary reserves "the life insurance of corporations." Others, unable to carry the burden, will dissipate their surpluses in dividends. Mr. Roosevelt has suggested that they can then borrow money for new reserves. But how much could they have borrowed in the depths of the depression? The New Deal thus far has found wholesale borrowing a sovereign remedy for financial folly and imprudence. But its day of reckoning will come and it would come much sooner for a private business enterprise that tried to follow its example.

In defending this bill in the debate which starts today, let the new dealers at least be honest about it and admit that the purpose is to fasten the Government's grip on the corporations so that it can shake the life out of them if they refuse to do its bidding. There are measures in Congress today for putting all industry under Government ownership. There are proposals for constitutional amendments to make this legal.

It can't happen here—perhaps. But if this bill gets through House and Senate and to the White House, where it is assured of approval, the next step of the New Deal may take it even further along the road to state socialism. If Government control of corporate reserves, why not control of individual savings?

No, Mr. Chairman, this bill does not and will not do for the country that and those things which my good and conscientious friends who are its proponents may believe or hope. Their hopes will not end in fruition. On the contrary, in my judgment, this is one of the most devastating, destructive, and impotent tax measures ever imposed by Congress upon a long-suffering but not unsuspecting public.

Whether we like it or not it is true; it is susceptible of demonstration that the deficit for the next year will exceed $5,000,000,000, the largest deficit ever incurred by any government, our own or foreign, except in time of war.

Our gross public debt is approximately $50,000,000,000, which equals the present national income. Will the Budget ever be balanced? There is no promise nor indication either in the situation itself or in the Executive Budget message. We are faced with and by greater disaster in Government finances instead of an approach to a balanced Budget.

Seven years of budgetary deficits. History and experience show and teach that every nation which has permitted deficits in any way comparable for such periods has found the greatest difficulty if not the impossibility of escaping the devastating consequences of uncontroverted inflation.

I say to you that attempts to overcome the disorder through increasing the tax burdens rather than by lowering the excessive and reckless expenditures lead us only farther into that miasmatic swamp of national bankruptcy from which eventually there is no escape.

It is not a pretty picture, but now is the time to take a look at it and to stop and to look and to listen. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DOXEY] such time as he may desire.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] chairman of the great House Ways and Means Committee, has always been most gracious to me. I thank him and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] very much indeed for the time extended to me.

Several days have already been consumed in debating this tax bill on the floor of this House. I realize that there is very little that I could add to what has already been said. Friends and foes alike have expressed their views and argued at length this measure.

Of course, any tax bill is highly controversial and always unpopular. Taxation from any standpoint is not pleasant. However, we must have money to carry on this Government and there is no way to get it except for Congress to enact tax laws.

Many of us here would like to see some changes and modifications made in the bill before us. There are some provisions in the bill that we should like to see omitted, some changes that we should like to see made, and some items included that have been left out. However, as we view this broad, intricate, and complicated tax proposition as a whole, I am going to follow the recommendations of our President and the judgment of this great Ways and Means Committee. They have spent weeks and weeks working on this tax measure, while most of us were busy with the work of our own committees. We were not privileged nor did we have the time to attend the hearings and committee discussions during the framing of this bill. The members of the Ways and Means Committee were charged with that responsibility and I know they have discharged those duties well. I shall vote for this bill, believing that it is the best bill it was possible, under the circumstances, for the committee to present to the membership of this House for our consideration. My philosophy of taxation is to tax those who are best able to pay. It is necessary that we all be taxed, for we are all benefited, but those in the higher brackets with the largest incomes should carry the heaviest load in accordance with their ability to pay. It is some difficult problem to equalize taxes.

Mississippi, my home State, pays into the Federal Treasury comparatively a small amount of taxes for the reason that the incomes subject to Federal taxation are comparatively small. About 4,076 individuals in Mississippi out of a total population of approximately 2,009,821 paid Federal income taxes in 1935, which was only about .07 percent of the total United States internal revenue receipts for 1935. The tax burden in Mississippi is not caused by Federal taxation. The Federal Government obtains its revenue from levying taxes on incomes, custom receipts, excise taxes, tariffs, and such like. There is no Government ad valorem tax. That is a form of taxation that is reserved strictly for the States. Most of Mississippi's tax levies are State, county, and city taxes. Comparatively a small percentage of taxes paid by Mississippians goes to the Federal Government.

When we consider the direct benefits the State of Mississippi has received from Government funds being expended in our State, we realize that as a State, Mississippi has received many, many times more dollars from the Government than has been paid into the Federal Treasury by the taxpayers of Mississippi.

Mississippi, under the present Democratic administration, has received greater recognition than under any former administration in the history of this Government. The record speaks for itself.

During this discussion it will be necessary for me to deal with certain technical facts and a great mass of figures as shown by the record. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlemen from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOXEY. My friends and colleagues, in this connection, permit me to briefly outline some of the substantial benefits received by the Second Congressional District of Mississippi, which I have the honor and privilege to represent in Congress, as a result of our efforts here.

Since I have been a Member of Congress, my congressional district has benefited more from governmental activities than it ever had during the entire previous history of our State. More Federal funds have been spent in the Second Congressional District of Mississippi during my service here in Congress than was spent in it from the time it was established as a congressional district up until the beginning of the Roosevelt administration, March 4, 1933.

What does the record show as to some of the worthwhile and substantial benefits flowing from the Federal Government into the Second Congressional District of Mississippi during my service as Congressman from this district?

[2] Declined.
[3] Not closed.
[4] Loan rescinded.

In fact, up to April 3, 1936, the R. F. C. had received 76 formal applications from drainage and levee districts in Mississippi. The indebtedness covered by these applications, as submitted, aggregates $11,798,453.46. The R. F. C. has authorized 64 loans to such districts in Mississippi to refinance $11,183,515.86. Of these, 28 have been closed and $2,797,313.65 disbursed to date.

You can see from these figures that in the refinancing of these various drainage districts by the Federal Government the taxpayers were not only given a breathing spell, so to speak, by being given loans over a long period of time at a low rate of interest, but the original amount of indebtedness of each district is being reduced by anywhere from 30 to 70 percent, thereby causing a great saving to the taxpayers on the amount of indebtedness that is now outstanding against the district.

This was made possible as the result of a law enacted in the Congress and known as the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933.

This law was the work of the House Committee on Agriculture, of which I am the second ranking member out of a membership of 26 Representatives in Congress who constitute this exclusive committee. My committee wrote the bill, reported it, and steered it to passage through the House. This was in truth and in fact a farm-relief measure through tax relief. During the debate of this bill in Congress, I made a speech on the floor of the House explaining the measure and urging its passage. It passed the House and was passed by the Senate in modified form. I was selected as a House conferee on the bill and worked with the Senate conferees in shaping and fashioning it for final passage in both the House and the Senate.

This was the first time within the history of our country that any legislation was ever enacted by Congress to help refinance distressed and tax-burdened drainage and levee districts with funds furnished by the Federal Government.

At the present time the Subcommittee on Agriculture, of which I am chairman, is considering and endeavoring to finally shape and report to Congress other legislation of a more permanent nature with a view to the Government further helping to carry the load placed on the farms and property located and being situated in these various drainage, levee, irrigation, and reclamation districts organized under the laws of the respective States.

The Second Congressional District of Mississippi has received its proportionate share of these long-term Federal loans at a low rate of interest.

Under date of February 14, 1935, I introduced in Congress H. R. 5697, providing for similar loans to distressed and tax-burdened public and special school districts.

I also introduced another bill—H. R. 7523—providing that the rate of interest on money loaned to the drainage and levee districts shall not exceed 3 percent.

During recent years Congress has provided other governmental loaning agencies designed to help the taxpayer secure long-term loans at a low rate of interest on easy payments, such as the Federal land bank, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Federal Housing Administration, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Commodity Credit Corporation, and so forth.

The total number of home loans closed in Mississippi as of March 26, 1936, amounts to 8,744, totaling $16,375,742. The loans closed in the Second Congressional District of Mississippi are as follows:

These are governmental agencies loaning Government money on real estate and other securities and these measures were handled by the Banking and Currency Committee. My Committee on Agriculture handled the legislation pertaining to personal property security and loans limited to farmers and farm lands in refinancing farm mortgages such as the Farm Credit Administration's land banks, cooperative banks, associations, corporations, and seed-loan offices, which have so greatly benefited our section of the country and helped the farmers who were not financially able to help themselves.

All legislation pertaining to agriculture and farm rehabilitation and refinancing, including emergency crop, feed and seed loans, originated and is within the exclusive jurisdiction of my Committee on Agriculture in the House of Representatives. We have set up a separate and sound credit system for agriculture in an effort to care for the credit needs of the farmer.

II

AGRICULTURAL PLANS AND BENEFITS

Let us turn from the governmental loaning agencies which we have set up in an effort to refinance, rehabilitate, and help the taxpayers, home owners, business, and farming interests of this country and review the record as to the efforts of Congress to help agriculture and pay direct benefits to the farmers of our State and district, which is classed in the main as an agricultural State and district.

Not until May 12, 1933, when Congress enacted the A. A. A. was any legislation ever passed directly benefiting the farmers of this country. This is the first time the farmer and the producer of our crops was ever paid direct benefits by the Government. The farmers of my district never before received a Government check, unless they were soldiers or worked for the Government or sold something to the Government.

This law was the work of my Committee on Agriculture. It was designed to put agriculture on a parity with industry—to raise the price paid the farmer for the crops he raised—to make farming a paying and profitable business. We tried to do for the farmer by this law what the tariff laws had done for industry. We provided that direct payments and benefits would be placed in the farmer's hands and pockets out of funds taken from the Federal taxes laid on the processors who turned the raw materials in their factories and mills into the finished products. It worked.

Mississippi as a State paid in agricultural-adjustment taxes for the fiscal year 1935, $619,172.96. Mississippi received in rental and benefit payments through December 31, 1935, to the individual farmers and producers, $34,379,868.30. In other words, in Mississippi, by the operation of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, for every $1 the processors of Mississippi paid into the Government Treasury the Government in turn paid to the individual farmer in Mississippi about $35. The agricultural States received the benefits. The manufacturing States paid them.

Official statistics show that Maine paid in A. A. A. taxes during fiscal year of 1935, $1,254,029.35; Maine received in rental and benefit payments under the A. A. A., $6,065; Massachusetts paid in A. A. A. taxes during fiscal year of 1935, $19,874,136.95; Massachusetts received in rental and benefit payments under A. A. A., $1,267,126.21; New York paid in A. A. A. taxes during fiscal year of 1935, $58,842,770.85; New York received in rental and benefit payments under A. A. A., $569,601.44; Pennsylvania paid in A. A. A. taxes during fiscal year of 1935, $18,600,912.60; Pennsylvania received in rental and benefit payments under A. A. A., $3,282,107.11; Rhode Island paid in A. A. A. taxes during fiscal year of 1935, $1,862,519.65; Rhode Island received in rental and benefit payments under A. A. A., $6,319.49.

These are some of the manufacturing States. Now, compare what they paid and what they received with what some of our agricultural Southern States paid and received.

Official statistics show that Mississippi paid in A. A. A. taxes during fiscal year of 1935, $619,172.96; Mississippi received in rental and benefit payments under A. A. A., $34,379,868.30; Alabama paid in A. A. A. taxes during fiscal year of 1935, $7,532,275.60; Alabama received in rental and benefit payments under A. A. A., $29,938,661.70; Florida paid in A. A. A. taxes during fiscal year of 1935, $932,546.52; Florida received in rental and benefit payments under A. A. A., $2,852,837.16; Georgia paid in A. A. A. taxes during fiscal year of 1935, $20,678,114.74; Georgia received in rental and benefit payments under A. A. A. $30,947,145.52; Louisiana paid in A. A. A. taxes during fiscal year of 1935, $6,598,308.74; Louisiana received in rental and benefit payments under A. A. A., $29,549,383.54.

You can readily see why the big interests and the industrial States of this Union did everything they could to kill this law and wreck this program. To our sorrow and great loss, they succeeded when the Supreme Court, on January 6, 1936, in the Butler case, declared the Agricultural Adjustment Act unconstitutional. While the A. A. A. was in force, however, the following is the amount of money paid by the Government in direct benefits to the farmers of the Second Congressional District of Mississippi, by counties:

Farm Credit Administration, Division of Finance and Research, April 3, 1936.
No drought-relief loans.

When the A. A. A. program was scrapped and knocked out by the Supreme Court the first of this year, did this Congress and this administration throw up their hands and quit and say, "We cannot do anything to help the farmers of this country, because the Supreme Court has thrown around us such restrictions and limitations that we cannot legislate in behalf of agriculture"? No! A thousand times no.

My Committee on Agriculture went to work as we had never worked before, and today there is on the Federal statute books a law as the result of our efforts, designed to help agriculture, stabilize the price the farmer gets for his products, and pay the individual farmer and producer of crops direct benefits out of the Federal Treasury and at the same time save and protect his lands. But we cannot tax the processor for this specific purpose and make the present agricultural program pay its way and be self-sustaining as was the A. A. A. That is one great drawback and serious limitation placed upon Congress by the recent decision of the Supreme Court. This law that I helped to write, spoke for, and worked for, is a substitute for the A. A. A. and is known as the soil-conservation plan and temporary farm program, 1936–37, and provides for a permanent State farm plan beginning 1938, the success of which remains yet to be determined. It is the best we can do for the present. If it is administered properly, wisely, and justly, as Congress intended it, this substitute A. A. A. will mean much to our district, State, and Nation. It will form the bedrock for a soil-rebuilding, conservation, and rehabilitation program that is so essential and vital to agriculture in general and to our district in particular.

III

NATIONAL FORESTS

Long before I came to Congress I was interested in agriculture, reforestation, soil-erosion, soil-conservation, and flood-control problems. No work of this type had been undertaken by the Government in our section of the State except some flood protection along the Mississippi River.

I knew that, generally speaking, in our method of farming we were taking everything we could away from our lands and putting very little back in improvements on our lands. Such treatment of our lands would inevitably lead to wreck and ruin. That has been the universal history of every other country that pursued that policy. Only when the people realize that their lands are their greatest assets and should be so treated and used, can our prosperity be lasting and secure.

Our forests had been denuded, our timber ruthlessly cut and slaughtered. Our lands were washing away, and our floods each year were becoming more serious.

I knew it was a problem so big that only this Government could handle it with any degree of success, so I came to Congress with the determination to do my best to get the Federal Government interested in these vital problems. I felt I could better serve my Nation, State, and district as a member of the Committee on Agriculture than by being on any other committee in Congress. Mississippi had not had a member on this exclusive Committee on Agriculture for about 15 years. After serving my apprenticeship for several years on other committees of Congress, I was elevated by my colleagues to this great House Committee on Agriculture. I was happy, but we still had a Republican administration, and the Democrats had very little to do with shaping the Government's policy. However, I tried to prepare myself for the opportunity that I believed would soon present itself. The opportunity came. The Democrats first got control of the House in 1931. We elected Hon. J. N. (Jack) Garner, of Texas, on December 7, 1931, Speaker of the House while Mr. Hoover was still President and the Republicans were in control of the Government.

Speaker Garner on December 11, 1931, appointed me as the Democratic Member of the House on the National Forest Reservation Commission. This Commission is composed of three members of the President's Cabinet, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of the Interior; two United States Senators, one Republican, one Democrat; and two Congressmen, one Republican and one Democrat.

When I was first appointed to this Commission in December 1931 the Cabinet members were all Republicans; one of the Senators on the Commission was Republican, Senator KEYES, of New Hamphire, and the other Congressman on the Commission was Republican, Hon. Willis C. Hawley, of Oregon, who was coauthor of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of June 17, 1930. Senator Harris, of Georgia, and I were the only two Democrats on this important National Forest Reservation Commission. Naturally we were then able to do very little for the South, where up to that time there were practically no national forests. They had all been established in the West, the Northwest, and the northeastern part of the United States. No money scarcely for reforestation was up to that time being spent in the South.

Times changed. Mr. Franklin Delano Roosevelt was elected President; Mr. Jack Garner was elected Vice President; and the Democrats gained control and took over the reins of government on March 4, 1933. Our Speaker of the House, Hon. Jack Garner, having been elected Vice President of the United States, we the Democrats of the House elected the Honorable Henry Rainey, of Illinois, as Speaker of the House of Representatives. He reappointed me as the Democratic Congressman to the National Forest Reservation Commission on March 27, 1933, and his successor, Speaker JOE BYRNS, reappointed me to this Commission on January 23, 1934. In the meantime Senator Harris, of Georgia, died, and Senator GEORGE, of Georgia, was appointed to take his place on the Commission. The three Cabinet members were now Democrats instead of Republicans, so the tables were just reverse to what they were under the Republican administration. All members of the National Forest Reservation Commission under the Roosevelt administration are Democrats except two, a Republican Senator, Senator KEYES, of New Hampshire, and Congressman WOODRUFF, of Michigan. May I say in passing that both of these Republicans have cooperated with us in a wonderful fashion. All members of the Commission resolved to inaugurate a real reforestation program if we could get the money to put our plans into operation.

President Roosevelt was vitally interested in our work and plans. Congress cooperated, and we have obtained results. Since March 4, 1933, the achievements of the National Forest Reservation Commission, working in cooperation with the efficient Forest Service of our Government under the Department of Agriculture, has a record that is outstanding and will, more and more as time goes on, mean much to our people. No State in the Union has been dealt with more generously by our Commission than has Mississippi. Today Mississippi has seven national-forest units, and the following figures show the status of these seven national-forest units as of April 3, 1936.

The land purchased by the Government for these various forest units has been mostly cut-over, worn-out, and submarginal lands.

One of these national forest units established by my Commission in Mississippi, as you will see from the foregoing table, is located in the Second Congressional District and is known as the Holly Springs National Forest unit and embraces lands in Tippah, Union, Benton, Lafayette, and Marshall Counties.

In addition to the land-acquisition program, the Government is spending vast sums developing and improving the Holly Springs National Forest unit. From the beginning the Government has only wanted to purchase the land that the farmer could not use profitably. The Government's policy is to buy the worn-out lands, the cut-over lands, the submarginal lands, and the eroded lands, and convert these lands into profitable and valuable lands and forests by means of soil rehabilitation and reforestation. This is what the Government is trying to do in my district with the Holly Springs National Forest unit. Thousands of trees, best adaptable to our soil and climatic conditions, have been set out. Grasses have been planted, soil erosion has been checked, water and drainage-control projects have been constructed, protection methods have been employed, fire-prevention apparatus has been installed, lookout towers have been erected, telephone lines have been built, good roads have been made through the lands embracing the forest unit, and other improvements are in the making in an endeavor to develop the Holly Springs unit into a real national forest.

This all takes time, money, and effort on the part of the Government. We have no large tracts of cut-over lands in our section. The purchases must necessarily be limited to comparatively small acreage, which means a great deal of title and abstract work, for the strict regulations of the Government with reference to land titles complicate matters and make it difficult for the Government to make much progress in acquiring and paying for lands in our forest unit. Our Commission realizes that it is one of the hardest sections of the entire country in which to establish a national forest unit, but my contention is that no section of the country anywhere is in greater need of a Government forest than our district. The work and its value thus far are there to show for themselves. If and when, in days to come, the Government derives any revenue from this forest unit, by sale of timber, grazing, hunting, recreation, or otherwise, 25 percent of the gross returns to the Government is paid by the Government into the general county funds of the county in which the land is situated to be used and spent by the respective counties for school and road improvements within the county.

This present Democratic administration, under the leadership of a great President, is planning and working for the benefit of generations yet unborn.

C. C. C. CAMPS

March 31, 1936, marks the third anniversary of the Civilian Conservation Corps camps. This was one of the first of the New Deal's projects and also one of the most beneficial, successful, and far-reaching. The planning and launching of this C. C. C. program was the brainchild of President Franklin D. Roosevelt; Congress cooperated. Various agencies of the Government took part in this undertaking. Naturally, most of the first camps to be established were to be located on Government-owned land. Some States, particularly the South, had very little Government-owned land. Mississippi at that time practically had no tracts of Government-owned lands within its borders.

The Government did at that time own a little land in the Homochitto National Forest, the first national-forest unit to be established in Mississippi. But ever since I had been a member of the National Forest Reservation Commission I had been talking, planning, urging, and working to establish a national-forest unit in my congressional district. The unit was in the making, but the actual boundaries had not been established because of lack of funds. The upper watershed of the Tallahatchie Basin in my district was a location that was being considered for this unit. So when the first C. C. C. camps were located in Mississippi they were placed in or near the already established Homochitto National Forest unit in southwest Mississippi, and also within or somewhere near the contemplated national-forest unit that my Commission hoped to establish in north Mississippi within the upper watershed of the Tallahatchie Basin. That is the reason that the first C. C. C. camps to be located in Mississippi were, for the major part, in two areas—the Homochitto area and the upper Tallahatchie River Basin area, where we planned to establish a national-forest unit in my district, which our Commission did establish shortly thereafter. Just as soon as Government funds were made available and the details could be worked out the Holly Springs National Forest Unit was established by the National Forest Reservation Commission, of which I was a member.

My friends, whether it is generally known or not, that is the main reason why the Second Congressional District was originally selected for the location of most of Mississippi's first C. C. C. camps. The counties of Marshall, Benton, Tippah, Union, Lafayette, Pontotoc, Tate, and Panola were originally selected for establishment of the first C. C. C. camps in Mississippi. Those counties, or a portion of them, were in the upper watershed of the upper Tallahatchie River Basin, and the contemplated forest unit in our section was being considered to embrace a portion of the lands in these counties. It afterward developed in determining the exact boundary lines of the Holly Springs Forest Unit that no lands in the counties of Tate and Panola would be embraced in this forest unit, for the reason that those two counties were not strictly within the upper watershed of the Tallahatchie River Basin and were located a little too far down in the Tallahatchie Basin, although C. C. C. camps had already been located in those two counties—one at Tyro in Tate County and one near Batesville in Panola County. That is the reason we were never able to locate a C. C. C. camp in Tallahatchie County or in De Soto County. Tallahatchie County was too far down in the lower reaches of the Tallahatchie Basin, and De Soto County was not in the watershed of the Tallahatchie River at all. At that time only the upper watershed of the Tallahatchie Basin was considered in connection with the establishment of the proposed national-forest unit in our section of Mississippi.

The C. C. C. program later developed so that, regardless of whether or not the Government owned any lands at or near where the C. C. C. camps were located, if the erosion and soil-conservation element was serious, there would be a class or type of camps known strictly as soil-conservation camps which could be located on privately owned lands.

On account of this broadened phase of the program, we were able recently, comparatively speaking, to have C. C. C. camps located in Yalobusha County and Tate County. These camps are known as soil-conservation camps. Those camps that are located in our district in the upper watershed of the Tallahatchie but which are on lands that the Government did not embrace in the forest unit that it later established, are also known as soil conservation camps. Those camps in our district located on Government-owned lands within the Holly Springs National Forest unit are known as forest camps.

I appreciate immensely that after the Government actually began the purchase of lands within the confines of our forest unit, the camp that was first established on this forest land was named "Camp Wall Doxey."

We have all three types of camps in the Second Congressional District of Mississippi—soil-conservation camps, national-forest camps, and a State-park camp. This last-named camp is known as Spring Lake State Park Camp and is located in Marshall County, and the plans are for this Spring Lake State Park to be made one of the real show places of our section of the country.

I understand that in proportion to the amount of land owned by the Government and the area involved, no congressional district in the United States has had located in it as many C. C. C. camps as the Second Congressional District of Mississippi. Each one of the 10 counties within the district has had at least 1 camp located in it within the last 3 years, except the 2 counties of Tallahatchie and De Soto, although I have done my best for each of these counties. However, De Soto is outside the watershed selected and Tallahatchie County is not within the badly eroded upper part of the Tallahatchie River watershed selected for the location of these camps. However, I have been for some time and am still working for resettlement and rehabilitation and soil-conservation developments in the basin of the Coldwater River. I hope before long these developments will be a reality. From time to time certain camps had to be abandoned in accordance with the Executive orders of the President to cut and reduce camps in order to conserve the available funds. We have had several camps abandoned in the district and later reestablished when funds became available for the purpose.

Although we all know the value of the work and the necessity for it, we are having a hard time obtaining funds with which to carry on the present C. C. C. program. Naturally when a reduction is found necessary and a reduction is ordered, Mississippi is required to take her pro-rata share of the cut, and as a result the cut falls heaviest in the Second District for the reason that we have all along and still have more C. C. C. camps in our district than in any other congressional district in the State. I am informed that my home town, Holly Springs, Miss., has the distinction of being the only town in the United States that has in it or right near it two World War veterans' C. C. C. camps.

No one regrets his district's losing a camp any more than I do. I know how hard it is to get a C. C. C. camp and I know the great work the camps are doing and what they mean to business and to the community in which they are located.

Just how many camps will be continued and how long the C. C. C. program will last no one at this time knows. However, I do feel that we are all thankful for what the program has already done for our district; and whether a camp was located in every community or not, we appreciate the fact that we got as many camps as we could, and certainly we did our best to keep what camps we had. We are now faced with conditions over which we have no control; and when a reduction in this program becomes necessary, it is incumbent upon us to take our share of the cut and make the best of it.

The number of Mississippi men working in C. C. C. camps has varied from time to time. On April 5, 1933, the Mississippi quota was set at 4,400. This was increased to 9,200 when the decision was reached in the spring of 1935 to expand the whole C. C. C. program. On August 31 Mississippi had a total of 12,239 men actually enrolled in C. C. C. camps. The strength of the C. C. C. nationally on that date was approximately 506,000. On February 1 the number of Mississippi men in C. C. C. camps was 9,660. On that date there were 9,021 men working in camps located in Mississippi.

Altogether, an aggregate of 20,657 young men from Mississippi have been enrolled in the Civilian Conservation Corps, from the beginning through February 1, 1936. Mississippi enrollees allotted home to dependents approximately $4,780,000 during this period out of their basic cash allowance of $30 a month.

Obligations for the State of Mississippi through December 31, 1935, were approximately $19,486,000.

The Second Congressional District of Mississippi has had the following C. C. C. camps, some of which are still being operated:

It is likely that finally on a very much reduced basis this C. C. C. program will be worked out so as to give it in a limited way a permanent status. Its purpose is to rehabilitate young men by giving them employment and advantages to prepare them for useful citizenship, as well as to help in a financial way their dependents at home. World War veterans and their families have also been benefited.

The part these camps have played in helping to solve the unemployment situation and giving our young men and soldiers a break, as well as the type of work they have done, make us realize it is a great program for a worthy cause during this depression.

Aside from saving lands and forests, these C. C. C. camps have greatly benefited young men in more ways than one.

It is the aim of this administration to help the youth of this Nation, and with this in mind the National Youth Administration was created.

The allocations under the N. Y. A. for the student-aid program in Mississippi are as follows:

	For the year
School aid	$113,952
College aid	170,150
Graduate aid	675

The allocation for National Youth Administration work projects in Mississippi is $427,500, for the operation of recreational projects, rural-youth development projects, public-service projects, and research projects.

The student-aid program in Mississippi provided assistance to 5,733 students in February 1936, distributed to the high schools, colleges, and graduate schools.

Youth projects in Mississippi are employing 4,000 young men and women throughout the State. The following are typical projects in operation in the Second Congressional District:

	Total cost	Location of project	Number of youth assigned
			Male	Female
Public service project	$36	Panola County	0	2
Recreation project	180	Benton County	0	4
Do	270	De Soto County	2	4
Do	270	Lafayette County	2	4

Total	2,790		20	48

Our Government also provides for a limited number of qualified young men to enter the Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md., and the West Point Military Academy at West Point, N. Y.

I have been able during my service in Congress to offer an appointment to either the Naval Academy or the West Point Military Academy to some boy in each county of our district. It is estimated that the cost to the Government for a 4-year course at either academy is approximately $12,000.

V

FLOOD CONTROL—SARDIS RESERVOIR

The flood situation in what is known as the backwater area of Mississippi has always been a serious problem for our district. Local interests have spent a great deal of money for flood protection in our district, but we never could get the Federal Government to consider it as a national or Federal problem and help us in the "backwater area." The Government took the position that our rivers were not navigable; that is, they were not necessary to the navigation of the Nation, and therefore the Government had no jurisdiction over them even though they were tributaries of the Mississippi River. The Government had many surveys made of the rivers and conditions in our section of the State but every report made by the Government and Army Engineers was unfavorable and carried the specific recommendation that it was a local flood problem and not one subject to Federal flood control and the expenditure of Federal funds. No progress toward obtaining Government aid to help us control our floods in the backwater area was made other than obtaining Government surveys, maps, opinions, reports, and hearings before congressional committees.

I introduced in Congress H. R. 6190, a bill "To provide for the control of the waters of the Coldwater, Tallahatchie, Yocona, Yalobusha, and Yazoo Rivers in Mississippi, and for other purposes." This bill of mine provided, among other things, that such plan for the improvement of navigation and the control of the waters of these rivers and their tributaries should include channeling, straightening, and deepening the streams, soil-erosion prevention on the watersheds by reforestation of abutting land and other methods, and the establishment of reservoirs for the control and storage of the water.

My flood-control bill further provided that the Government, in order to carry out the purposes of the act, be authorized to enter into contracts, to purchase lands, to erect dams and other structures, and to do all things necessary to prosecute the plans therein set forth. My bill authorized an appropriation not to exceed $60,000,000 to be used and spent by the Government for this purpose. However, up to the present time we have never been able to get any legislation passed in Congress to control the flood waters of these rivers and their tributaries and protect this backwater area from the destruction of the floods in this section of our State. Nevertheless, we have kept on working with everybody from President Roosevelt on down the line, and last year after Congress adjourned we succeeded in getting President Roosevelt to issue an Executive order allocating $1,000,000 to be used in the construction of what is known as the Sardis Reservoir, in the Second Congressional District of Mississippi. It was understood that this was a $10,000,000 project, and that if and when the landowners in the counties of Panola, Lafayette, and Marshall would agree to sell to the Government at a reasonable price sufficient lands to construct the reservoir and store the water, there would be some way provided to get the other $9,000,000 to complete the project. The landowners in these counties were immediately contacted, and most of them signed the necessary options. This preliminary and necessary work required time, and the Government's district engineer, Col. L. E. Oliver, had charge of the work. He submitted his report to the authorities in Washington the first of this year, and it was accepted and passed upon favorably.

However, it is to be noted that this is the only project of its kind in the United States where the Government agrees to purchase the necessary lands from the land owners. It is the Government's policy to do only the actual construction work on such projects, and all necessary lands and rights-of-way are furnished by the local interests. We told the President and all other Government authorities in the beginning that it would be impossible for the people, the land owners, the districts, the counties, or the State of Mississippi to provide and furnish these necessary lands, and that the only way to obtain this land for the purpose of constructing the Sardis Reservoir was for the Government to buy the land. So it was understood when we procured the first million dollars that the Government would make an exception in this particular case of the Sardis Reservoir and pay for the land if it could be obtained at a reasonable price. The land owners of our district have substantially agreed to sell their lands at a price considered fair and reasonable. So after the report was filed in Washington, the next step was to obtain the other $9,000,000. The President, however, then had no funds available from which this $9,000,000 could be secured. Many emergencies had arisen since we procured the first million dollars, and all the funds had been allocated. As stated, those of us interested in this project have contacted everybody we thought could possibly help us with it from the President on down. I personally never missed an opportunity to bring it to the President's attention. I even discussed it with him several evenings ago when Mrs. Doxey and I were having Sunday evening supper at the White House with the President and Mrs. Roosevelt. I know President Roosevelt is our friend; he is with us, and is entirely appreciative of our position, but there is just no Federal fund available for this purpose at this time.

All the public-works money appropriated by Congress has been allocated, so Members of both the Senate and the House interested in our project have been, are, and will continue to do everything in their power to provide and secure the necessary funds in order that the Government may buy this land and begin construction of the Sardis Reservoir. However, so far the efforts of all of us combined have not been able to pass the necessary appropriation in Congress for this purpose, nor has the President been able to find any funds at his disposal so that by Executive order he could provide additional funds sufficient to purchase the land and insure construction of the reservoir. It will take nearly $2,000,000 to purchase the lands at the figures set forth in the options already signed by the landowners. It will take something like at least $9,000,000 to complete the construction of the reservoir proper. The Army Engineers and other authorities are not going to recommend that the Government take any further steps until sufficient Government funds are in hand so as to make certain that if and when the Sardis Reservoir is undertaken to be constructed by the Government, it will be sure to be completed. It is estimated that it will require 2 years to complete the project and that it will give employment to 5,000 persons and that the total cost to the Government, including the purchasing of the land, which will be about 100,000 acres, will be something over $10,000,000. This is the first project of its kind anywhere in the South on which even this much progress has been made. Both Mississippi Senators, all seven Mississippi Congressmen, and all their friends are doing everything in their power to definitely secure sufficient funds to construct the Sardis Reservoir as soon as possible. The construction of this reservoir means the beginning of a real and far-reaching flood-control program for our section of the country. Without it, it is going to be nearly impossible for us to get any other kind of Government flood relief in our backwater area. This Sardis Reservoir is the key to our flood problem in the backwater area of Mississippi.

If and when the construction of the Sardis Reservoir is assured and truly gets under way, then there will be some chance for us in our section to get other, further, extra, and possibly different Federal flood-control projects for our district and the entire backwater area. We all realize the importance and necessity for this reservoir and all of us are doing everything in our power to secure this project as soon as possible. We have a fight and a hard one, but we have gone a long way in our efforts to obtain this project. This time last year there were no signs of encouragement with regard to it. Today all preliminary steps have been taken and approved. If we can now obtain sufficient additional Government funds to insure the completion of this project, work on the Sardis Reservoir will be begun within 30 days after we get the money for this purpose. Securing Government funds is now the problem. Believe me, it is a real problem, for this administration is reducing expenditures and cutting and slashing the use of Government funds in all directions. All kinds of programs and public works are being discontinued and abandoned. No new ones are being started. Economy, reform, reduction, retrenchment seem to be the order of the day, and I am for it strong.

VI

PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS

Since the inauguration of the public-works program, our State has received comparatively a small distribution of the funds, mainly for the reasons that local interests were unable to match Government funds as the requirements of the public-works program were that public-work projects would be instituted either by the Government extending, under certain conditions, "grants only", "loans and grants", and "loans only." Nevertheless, the Second Congressional District has shared fairly well on the type of projects on which the Government has furnished the major portion of the funds needed. Quite a number of new schools have been constructed and repaired; several light plants, waterworks, sewerage, and paving projects have been begun in a number of our towns. Some other public works of value and importance to the communities, villages, towns, and counties are under construction, but none that especially stand out as general public improvements except two, namely, the enlarging and remodeling of the Federal building at Oxford and the new post-office building to be constructed at New Albany, Miss.

These two permanent public-building projects are paid for entirely by the Government. The remodeling of the Federal building at Oxford will cost $82,500, and the estimated total cost of the new equipment for this building is $4,261.

The new post-office building at New Albany will cost approximately $68,000, including the site that was purchased by the Government for $12,000.

These are both great assets to our district. The fine and convenient Federal building at Oxford will serve the public and the citizens of the entire northern section of Mississippi. The real fight was begun for this building when as a new Member of Congress I was on the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The Republicans were then in power and I had to have help from my Republican friends and I got it. Congressman Dick Elliott, a Republican from Indiana, was then chairman of the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I was one of the Democrats on his committee, but we were friends. He went with me to see President Hoover and other high Republican officials in an effort then to get sufficient funds to improve the Oxford Federal building. Enough of my Republican friends then among the leaders of Congress helped me to obtain an authorization of $70,000 to be used to remodel this building at Oxford. This authorization was passed by a Republican Congress and approved by a Republican President in 1931. However, I was never able to get the actual money appropriated and set aside for this specific purpose until the Democrats came into power.

This handsome Federal building at Oxford will soon be completed and stands as a credit and monument to our district.

I have introduced in Congress bills to construct new post-office buildings at Ripley and Charleston, Miss., as well as at New Albany, but I was not able to get very far in securing a new post-office building for any town in the Second District except New Albany, for the reason that unless the receipts of a post office amounted to more than $10,000 a year no serious consideration could be given to the construction of a Federal building for the post office in that town. None of the post offices in the Second District at that time had yearly receipts amounting to more than $10,000, except those towns already having Federal buildings.

However, I am happy to say that the prospects now are that there may be some office in our district where the postal receipts will show an increase to more than $10,000 yearly, and I have just succeeded in getting the Post Office Department to have surveys made of the situation at both Ripley and Charleston, in an effort to get a new post-office building at one or both of these places.

VII

EMERGENCY RELIEF AND WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

In an effort to carry out our President's desire that no one should go hungry in this great Nation of ours, Congress, on May 12, 1933, enacted the Federal Emergency Relief Act. Under this act the total emergency relief expenditures for the State of Mississippi during 1933, 1934, and 1935 were:

Year	Total amount	Federal funds
		Amount	Percent
1933	$6,052,339	$5,994,201	99.0
1934	12,565,423	12,320,363	98.0
1935	13,641,949	12,713,575	93.2
Total	32,259,711	31,028,139	96.2

Of these amounts the Second Congressional District received the following:

FEDERAL EMERGENCY RELIEF ADMINISTRATION

[1] Includes obligations incurred for relief extended under the general relief program, under all special programs, and for administration; beginning April 1934 these figures also include purchases of materials, supplies, and equipment, rentals of equipment (such as team and truck hire) earnings of nonrelief persons employed, and other expenses incident to the emergency work relief program.

[2] Less than 1/10 of 1 percent.

However, the number of people without employment constantly increased the relief rolls until it was growing to such proportions that the Government thought it best for the morale of the people to adopt some plan whereby people could be taken off the relief rolls and be given an opportunity to earn their support or to earn enough to tide them over. Thus, it was that the WPA came into being, and the fundamental principles with regard to the W. P. A. program were that the projects should be useful and of such a nature that a considerable proportion of the money spent would go into wages for labor; also, that all projects must be of a character to give employment to "those on the relief rolls"; and that projects must be allocated to localities or relief areas in relation to the number of workers on relief rolls in those areas. In the beginning the stipulation was that all projects must employ at least 90 percent of their labor from relief rolls. This prevented many worthy projects being established in our district. In fact, last fall there was a great deal of uncertainty and dissatisfaction attending this W. P. A. program in Mississippi, so a month before Congress convened I left home and came to Washington, as I knew there were many matters that I could handle better by contacting the various authorities of the departments here in person than I could by staying down home and writing or wiring them. One of the first things I did on my arrival in Washington was to contact the W. P. A. authorities in an effort to get our W. P. A. program in Mississippi functioning in a satisfactory and proper manner. The authorities here made concessions to Mississippi that were made to very few States in the Union. A drought area was created within the State, and I was successful in getting the authorities to include every county in our district in the drought-stricken area so that drought-stricken farmers might be eligible for work on W. P. A. projects, even though they had not been on the relief rolls; this meant that more people would be put to work and that more money would be spent in the District than would have been otherwise.

As a further effort along this line, I introduced on the first day of this session of Congress—January 3, 1936—a House joint resolution, No. 427, providing that on account of the drought and other conditions of nature over which we had no control, the rules and regulations then in effect as to who was eligible to be placed on the relief rolls and be put to work on the W. P. A. projects should be modified so as to include those persons living in drought- and flood-stricken areas who were not on the relief rolls but who were worthy and in need of help and employment and were willing to work although not on relief.

On orders issued by Mr. Harry Hopkins, the National Director of the Works Progress Administration in Washington, 10,000 additional persons were added to the eligible rolls of Mississippi for W. P. A. employment. Every county within our district was included, within what was designated as the "drought-stricken area", and about two million more dollars was allocated to Mississippi to be spent for additional relief-employment purposes under State supervision.

The entire Mississippi delegation, including both Senators and the seven Congressmen, have at all times done everything they could to obtain for Mississippi its fair share of this Federal relief money. For what and how it has been spent is a matter absolutely and entirely within the jurisdiction of the State authorities.

Federal participation in W. P. A. in our State is under the control and supervision of Dr. Wayne Alliston, the State director of the Works Progress Administration for Mississippi.

Obviously no office in Washington could undertake to earmark or designate which project in a State should be given preference or be put into operation; if they attempted to do that for one State, they would have to do it for all the States, which could not satisfactorily be done. Therefore, the selection and supervision of these projects was left entirely to the W. P. A. administrator in each State. In Mississippi the selection and supervision of these projects is entirely within the jurisdiction of the Mississippi State W. P. A. director—Dr. Alliston—and those working under him. Congressmen have nothing whatever to do with what projects are selected for construction or who is to work on them or who is to have jobs in the various set-ups. All that has been turned over to the Works Progress director of the State. All that Congress does or can do is to enact the law that will furnish the money for the work. That is what we have been doing. The administration of the law is entirely within the hands of State officials. Again, I repeat—the selection of the projects to be put into operation and the selection of the individuals who are put to work on the projects is left wholly up to the State and local authorities, and the Congressmen have nothing whatever to do with the same.

There have been many substantial and worth-while projects in our district selected and some constructed with Government funds by State W. P. A. officials—farm-to-market roads, school buildings and repairs on some; county, town, and village improvements of various kinds—and I trust some cold-storage plants, county agricultural buildings, National Guard armories, airports, recreational centers, and other permanent improvements that have already been approved by both State and Federal authorities will be established, even though they have not as yet been finally selected and designated for actual construction by the State Works Progress administrator of Mississippi, Dr. Wayne Alliston, with whom is lodged the final authority to order these projects constructed. Naturally, more projects were approved in Washington than will ever be finally selected and constructed out of W. P. A. funds. More applications were approved than funds were available for in order to give the State Works Progress administrators a flexible program, so that they would have a great number of projects to pick from in the selection and construction of the relatively few projects that will be finally completed with relief labor and paid for by the Government.

The Second Congressional District of Mississippi has thus far received a considerable portion of Federal funds spent for this type of relief.

Congress has provided other forms of relief, some paid for entirely out of Federal funds. Other relief measures enacted by Congress require the State also to provide State funds before the program can be put into operation.

One particular example of this type of relief where matching Government funds with State funds is required is the social-security program. That law enacted by Congress is intended to provide some safeguard against the insecurity of modern life through cooperative action by the Federal and State Governments.

The provisions of the Social Security Act make possible a number of distinct though related measures for social security grouped into about six general divisions, namely, (1) old-age assistance and old-age benefits; (2) unemployment compensation; (3) security for children; (4) aid to the blind; (5) extension of Public Health Service; (6) vocational rehabilitation.

In order for the people of a particular State to participate in these benefits, the State legislatures must enact State laws best suited to their particular State's local conditions and peculiar problems and provide for the use of State funds. For example, until the recent session of the Mississippi State Legislature, no aged citizen of Mississippi could secure any old-age benefits. Our legislature in March of this year passed an old-age-pension law and provided a million dollars to be used for the benefit of the needy and aged individuals of our State who come within the provisions of the law just passed by our State legislature.

The Federal Government will match on a 50–50 basis every dollar spent by the State for old-age assistance but will not contribute more than $15 per month for any one individual. In other words if the State puts up $15 per person, the Government will match it with $15 Federal funds, but no more. Of course, if the State puts up less, the Government will put up a like amount of money. When this matter was before Congress, many of us, especially those Members in Congress representing Southern States, endeavored to have the law enacted so as to require no matching by the State and require the Federal Government to put up all the money, not to exceed the amount of $30 per month for each old person eligible for the pension under the law and the regulations established. We failed after a hard fight.

The Mississippi delegation in Congress realized it would be a hard problem for our State to be able to match these Federal funds. However, now Mississippi has provided a million dollars for this purpose. What amount that will be for each worthy old person who comes within the provisions of the law, I do not know. The State administers the law, and it is handled in accordance with the State law by State officials. The plan no doubt will soon be worked out and be administered by the State agencies as to the amount to be paid to each aged person in Mississippi qualifying under the law.

In this connection Mississippi has already received under the Social Security Act for the months of February and March of 1936, the following:

	Old-age assistance	Aid to the blind	Aid to children
Grant for assistance	$175,000	$8,400	----------
Additional 5 percent for administration or assistance	8,750	420	----------
Total grant for assistance and administration	183,750	8,820	$32,356

Grand total, $224,926.

The State of Mississippi has received from the Federal Government through the Children's Bureau during the present fiscal year $20,400.10. This sum is the first payment to the State under the grants-in-aid provisions of the Social Security Act concerned with maternal and child health. Another payment of $30,600.34 will be made to Mississippi for this same purpose prior to June 30, 1936.

The appropriation for carrying out the provisions of the Social Security Act became available on February 11, 1936. Prior to this date the Children's Bureau had no responsibility for administering grants-in-aid measures, and there were therefore no payments to Mississippi for earlier years.

The amount of expenditures of the Public Health Service in the State of Mississippi for each of the last 6 years is as follows:

1935	49,251

The large expenditure during the fiscal year 1932 was on account of a special appropriation made by Congress for public-health work in drought-stricken areas.

The other related provisions of the Social Security Act depend upon enactment of State laws functioning in a similar manner as the old-age-pension plan.

The philosophy of this type of legislation is looking forward to and endeavoring to give security to the citizenship of this country. One of the outstanding pieces of legislation of this administration along this line has been the creation of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. We all know the chaotic condition facing this country in March 1933. Banks were failing and closing throughout the country, and in our district the bank failures had affected many of us in a most disastrous manner. It was a most serious problem, but the new administration took hold of the situation and Congress fashioned and enacted a measure whereby our banks were put on a more stable basis and your deposits today are guaranteed up to the amount of $5,000. We have the best and strongest Federal banking system today that this country has ever known, and it has been the purpose of this administration to protect the depositors in their life savings and to insure that the banking concerns that hold themselves out to do business with the people are on a firm, solid basis.

VIII

VETERANS' BENEFITS—SOLDIERS' BONUS

All during my public career I have never missed an opportunity to do what I could, under the circumstances, for any and all soldiers, their wives, children, and dependents.

Since I have been in Congress I have maintained and kept my office open for business the year round both at home and in Washington. Through each office there has been handled a great volume of business for the veterans of all wars, their wives, children, and dependents. There are many, many things that we tried and wanted to do for the veterans that we were unable to do—just could not do them under the circumstances, laws, rules, and regulations. Ever since I have been in Congress I have worked for the bonus—signed petitions and discharge motions, attended various conferences and caucuses, made speeches, cooperated in every way I could, and voted every time for the immediate cash payment of the so-called "soldier's bonus." Today it is a reality. The World War Veterans have their bonus in cash or will have it in cash on June 15, 1936, if they want it.

In my own State—Mississippi—36,802 World War veterans will receive $19,308,411.76, approximately.

The veterans of the 10 counties comprising the Second Congressional District of Mississippi will receive approximately the following amounts by counties:

Benton County	$94,322.56
De Soto County	244,510.06
Lafayette County	192,028.54
Marshall County	239,040.83
Panola County	275,364.58
Tallahatchie County	341,879.62
Tate County	167,853.66
Tippah County	179,340.70
Union County	204,428.02
Yalobusha County	170,613.00
Total to veterans of Second Congressional District of Mississippi	2,109,381.57

With more than $2,000,000 distributed for this purpose in our district at this time, everybody should be benefited. It is estimated that there will be a turnover of the money within the next 12 months of something like eight times. That means that this money will pay bills; provide for the necessities of life; purchase comforts for men, women, and children; create business; satisfy mortgages on homes and mortgages on personal property; and, in general, make life more worth while.

The statisticians say that the payment of the bonus throughout the entire country will cause this bonus money to do $16,000,000,000 worth of additional business in the United States within the next year. It belongs to the World War veterans and their families, and I am happy it is paid and that I had the privilege of helping the veterans get their bonus, along with many other benefits, such as disability allowances, compensation benefits, insurance benefits, funeral expenses, and so forth.

Whether Congress was in session or not, I stayed on the job and did the best I could at all times.

Aside from the amount of bonus mentioned above, the following statement indicates the approximate disbursements for veterans and dependents of deceased veterans of all wars for the fiscal years 1932, 1933, 1934, and 1935 for the State of Mississippi:

	1935	1934	1933	1932
All wars:
Compensation and pensions, veterans and dependents of deceased veterans (disability and death)	$5,088,117	$4,173,205	$8,237,842	$7,717,394
Military and naval insurance	1,298,693	1,330,524	1,574,424	1,560,104
Adjusted service and dependent pay	27,187	41,033	53,704	60,317
Adjusted-service certificates (matured by death)	222,044	249,496	268,787	206,603
Administration [1]	1,127,915	870,946	1,018,254	1,040,487
Construction	970	70,671	768,597	370,441
Total disbursement	7,764,926	6,735,875	11,921,608	10,955,296

[1] Includes expenditures incident to the maintenance and operation of all offices and hospitals, all forms of medical, hospital, and domiciliary care.

ROADS

Everybody has worked for good roads in Mississippi. From many standpoints we have already accomplished much in road building in our State. Mississippi has a highly satisfactory system of what is known as "secondary roads." Most all the roads in our district are graded and surfaced. Any time of the year—in all kinds of weather—nearly all the roads through the rural sections are passable. The reason we are held up to criticism as a State and district with regard to roads is on account of our main trunk lines designated as "through Federal highways" being for the most part graveled and not concreted. The conditions and the times demand that especially the main Federal highways be concreted. In our district, much money—county, State, and Federal funds—has already been spent on our good-roads program. The Government has certainly been generous in allocating Federal funds for road construction in Mississippi, as is shown by the following figures:

Federal highway funds apportioned to Mississippi by the Secretary of Agriculture, fiscal years 1929 to 1936, inclusive

Fiscal year	Federal aid		Forest roads	Repairing roads destroyed by floods
	Regular	Emergency
1929	$1,309,729.00			$628,000
1930	1,311,391.00
1931	2,212,421.00	$1,434,736	$4,270.50
1932	2,209,509.00		1,130.54
1933	1,907,440.80	2,160,164	14,251.41
1934		6,978,675	126,761.00
1935		3,540,227	26,749.87
1936	2,196,524.00	6,699,027	38,727.34
Total	11,147,014.80	20,812,829	211,890.66	628,000

These figures do not include funds recently made available to Mississippi under the $40,000,000 road program.

Already a part of Federal Highway 51 and a portion of Federal Highway 78 in our district are concreted. I feel certain that under the present $40,000,000 State road-building program at least these two main highways will be entirely concreted. Then the Second Congressional District will at least have a concrete highway running north and south and a main highway east and west completely concreted throughout our district.

Under this present program, it may be possible that other main highways in our district may be concreted. I hope so. But that remains yet to be seen. It has taken a great deal of time, labor, and cooperation on the part of us all to procure the present $40,000,000 road program for Mississippi. Our Governor, our State legislature, and all officials certainly did a good job and cooperated in a wonderful fashion. Our United States Senators and all Mississippi Congressmen worked at this job continuously not only during the sessions of Congress but during the recess of Congress. Through this cooperative effort we secured an outright gift or grant from the Federal Government of $15,000,000 for Mississippi, which made possible this present Mississippi $40,000,000 road program. In addition, the Federal Government loaned to Mississippi on long terms, at a low rate of interest, the sum of $18,500,000. Securing about $33,500,000 at this time from the Federal Government to build roads in any State is quite an accomplishment. It is also going to be a serious and responsible task to properly administer and execute this road program which has been placed in the hands of State officials.

May our great State and our splendid district obtain worth-while results and receive full, adequate, just, and fair value for the money to be expended in this progressive good-roads program in Mississippi.

T. V. A.—RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

When I first came to Congress one of the vital issues before it was the "development of Muscle Shoals." Nothing had been done with that great natural and national asset except the developments as a wartime project, resulting from the passage of a wartime measure by Congress during the Wilson administration.

After the World War, when the Democrats went out of power and a Republican administration was ushered in, the development of this great project came to a standstill. Both President Coolidge and President Hoover vetoed legislation passed by Congress for the further development of Muscle Shoals. Never were we able to do anything until the Democrats regained control of this Government and Mr. Franklin Delano Roosevelt occupied the White House as our Chief Executive. Since then we have been able to go places and do things. The first session of Congress under this Democratic administration passed legislation to develop Muscle Shoals and created the Tennessee Valley Authority, briefly referred to as the T. V. A. This development has been marvelous, and the work of the T. V. A. has been unsurpassed. From the beginning, a portion of our State—the northeastern part of Mississippi—was included within the area known as the T. V. A. area. At first, no territory embraced within the Second Congressional District of Mississippi was designated within the immediate T. V. A. development area. However, a project as big and as far-reaching as the T. V. A. necessarily will reach out and expand. As the construction of the various dams progressed, additional legislation by Congress was enacted and more Federal funds provided, which permitted other territory to be added to the Tennessee Valley area, and plans for development of our particular area began.

This expansion was reaching our way, and about 18 months ago the northeastern part of our district was included within this immediate T. V. A. area. Power and electrification developments by the T. V. A. started in portions of Union, Tippah, Benton, and Marshall Counties of Mississippi. Since then rapid strides have been made in this territory by T. V. A. Today with the city of New Albany, the county site of Union County, as the central distributing center for T. V. A. power and electrical energy in this section of our district, a new era is at hand for the people in this section of Mississippi.

Within the near future my home town of Holly Springs, Miss., will be also one of the central distributing cities for T. V. A. power. From time to time as additional territory is included within the T. V. A. area, other towns and counties in our district will be receiving T. V. A. power if they want it and go after it whole-heartedly. To my mind, the time is not far distant when all the territory comprising the Second Congressional District of Mississippi will have the opportunity to secure the wonderful advantages of T. V. A. Whether or not the terms and conditions incident to T. V. A. contracts are agreed to by the towns and counties offered this opportunity is a matter entirely in the hands of the people and the local authorities to accept or reject if and when the T. V. A. contract is tendered them. The purpose of the T. V. A. is to benefit the country people as well as the town people. The T. V. A. facilities afforded the towns as distributing centers will be necessary in order to construct power lines throughout our rural districts for rural electrification.

T. V. A. is the cheapest electrical power obtainable. That is an important factor in rural electrification.

Judge the future by the past. Wherever T. V. A. has gone, satisfaction has reigned. Cheap power and electricity mean more to both the city and the country development than any other one thing. T. V. A. promotes industry. It denotes progress. It insures the best for the least. It brings happiness. It relieves drudgery. It holds out the many benefits of cheap electrical energy to every home both in the cities and in the country. It will revolutionize our way of living and cause the eyes of the world to be on us. This T. V. A. development is just in its infancy. So is rural electrification.

The many and varied benefits of rural electrification in our district are just beginning to be felt. May it spread until every home in our district enjoys the blessings it has in store for us. Advancement, achievement, progress, and prosperity follow T. V. A. and rural electrification. It is an opportunity of a lifetime and makes living more worth while. Our district is indeed fortunate to have T. V. A. within its reach. To say that I am for it and have done everything I could to help bring it to us is putting it mildly. I have worked night and day, in season and out of season, for the development of the Tennessee Valley Authority. I was present when this case was argued in the Supreme Court of the United States. I was there when the decision of the Court was rendered by Chief Justice Hughes. I heard the only judge out of the nine Justices—Mr. Justice McReynolds—dissent.

A few weeks before, when I heard this same Court by a divided opinion of 6 to 3 declare our Agricultural Adjustment Act unconstitutional, I was distressed. I said then that the A. A. A. decision is a blow to us, but we can still do something for agriculture and enact a law as a substitute for the A. A. A., but if that Supreme Court declares the T. V. A. unconstitutional there is no hope of Congress passing a law as a substitute for T. V. A., so when the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the T. V. A., I was indeed happy.

In my judgment, there will yet be other legal attacks made upon T. V. A. The Supreme Court only passed upon a case where the facts involved Wilson Dam and its operation. That development was begun and completed during the World War, with its main purpose—national defense; these other developments such as Norris Dam, Wheeler Dam, and Pickwick Dam are peacetime developments and present different issues of fact as well as of law. I am certain that the Supreme Court of the United States will before long be called upon to decide these issues.

No one knows what, when, and how these issues will be presented to the Court. Nor do they know how the Supreme Court will decide them. Therefore I trust the people of my district and my State will at their first opportunity take advantage of T. V. A. if and when the opportunity is given them by this governmental agency. When we get T. V. A. it will be hard to take it away from us. However, until we do get it, there is always a chance of us not getting it.

One development leads to another. The entire program sponsored by this administration is interrelated and applies to all classes and affects directly or indirectly all persons in this country. With T. V. A. and rural electrification distributed to the farm homes of our district, we are in a better position to obtain a real Government rural resettlement project. I have been working on this resettlement program for our district ever since it was established by this present administration. We have felt some of its benefits by virtue of the Government renting some lands and endeavoring in every county in our district to rehabilitate some of our destitute farmers, but to date we have not been successful in getting a permanent resettlement colony established in our district, although examinations, surveys, and investigations have been made in various parts of our district; however, when these reports were compared by Washington officials with the reports of other districts making application for resettlement colonies, it was found that our district by comparison with the other districts did not show the need or the facilities or the land eligible for such projects that the other districts did. That is often the great stumbling block with regard to many projects.

A project viewed solely from a local standpoint looks worthy indeed and the applicants can see no reason why the Government should not take favorable action on their particular application. However, in Washington the project is viewed not from a local standpoint but from a national standpoint; that is, the authorities can handle just so many of a certain type of project; they consider all the applications—all the cases—and compare the merits of each one with the merits of all the rest. Then begins the process of selecting the one best meeting all the requirements, and in this process the case that looked so favorable from a local standpoint has not a chance when compared with all the other cases. And that is exactly what happened with the several applications I presented from our district to the Resettlement Administration in Washington.

However, this is about the only governmental activity under this New Deal program applicable at all to the conditions of our district that has not been securely located and operated within our district to date. It may be later that we will be successful in this regard as this resettlement program progresses.

Along this line there is now before my committee bills proposing "To establish the Farmers' Home Corporation, to encourage and promote the ownership of farm homes and to make the possession of such homes more secure, to provide for the general welfare of the United States, to provide rural rehabilitation and additional credit facilities for agricultural development and for tenant farmers, and for other purposes."

The membership of the House Committee on Agriculture has been working on this farm-tenant problem for quite a while. We realize it is a most serious and urgent problem, but it is going to take time, money, effort, and cooperation to get a satisfactory farm-tenant bill passed by Congress. I realize that the quicker we have more home owners and less tenancy in this country the better off this country will be. However, at this time we are faced with much opposition and it is going to take time to overcome this strong opposition.

Some important farm legislation will necessarily have to go over until the next Congress, and I am afraid that this is what will happen to the farm-tenant bill that is now being considered by my Committee on Agriculture. I am for home ownership in this country and am doing all I can to have such a law enacted by Congress as soon as possible.

In conclusion I give a brief summary of the many benefits that have poured into the State of Mississippi since Franklin Delano Roosevelt took office as the head of this great Nation.

The net total is an approximation of the amount of funds which has been loaned, allotted, expended, or disbursed in Mississippi since March 1933 by agencies and departments of the Federal Government. This is a conservative approximation and includes loans and grants of Federal funds to individuals, organizations, and to the State by the above agencies.

We all know and are deeply appreciative of the wonderful response that the Government and all relief agencies have given to our State in times of disaster as evidenced in the recent catastrophe that visited our section of the State and took such a heavy toll of life and property, especially at Tupelo, Miss.

This Democratic administration has delivered. It does not have to rely on empty promises and vain generalities. For the past 3 years well-marked signboards have been erected along the way of this administration from depression to prosperity. We have not yet reached our goal although we are marching surely and steadily onward in a great effort to make this country a better place in which to live and to provide for all its citizens the opportunity of a "more abundant life."

Of course, I have not attempted to set out all the benefits that we have received under this Roosevelt Democratic administration, but I believe from what I have shown, you feel, as I do, truly grateful for the benefits we have received under this humanitarian and far-sighted administration, and I am thankful that I was privileged to have a small part in helping to procure these benefits for my beloved country, State, and district. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, the first principle of taxation is that the burden should be apportioned in accordance with the ability to pay. The second principle is that, whenever possible, taxes should be assessed so as to advance sound principles of social justice. It is, therefore, well to examine the present tax bill in the light of these principles.

The outstanding provision of this bill is the tax on the total net income of corporations, with the rate varied according to the percentage of profits put into surpluses. For taxing purposes corporations are divided into those with adjusted net incomes of $10,000 or less and those with adjusted net income of more than $10,000. And the rate is increased according to the percentage of profits put into surplus—or otherwise held from distribution.

This is just, because those taxed are manifestly able to pay the tax. And it is highly desirable, because it is bound to have favorable social and economic consequences. Those who have made an unbiased study of our unstable and inequitable economic system quite generally agree that one of the major causes of its devastating booms and its ruinous periods of depression is the building up by great corporations of excessive surpluses.

These surpluses come, of course, out of profits. Profits arise from many sources, but the outstanding source in industry is the lowering of unit costs of production. This reduction in unit costs is largely due to the decreased cost of labor per unit of production. The lower labor costs may be, and usually are due to improved machinery, which lessens the man-hours of labor applied to the making of the product. This should be a blessing to all mankind, and it could be if human welfare had any reasonable consideration in industry. But, unfortunately, the introduction of labor-saving machinery results in the throwing of men and women out of work and the consequent reduction of public purchasing power.

Thus, tragically, labor-saving machinery has increased profits and has reduced the share of labor in the products of industry. And in many cases the stockholders in the industrial corporations have not received their fair share of the increased profits. Instead a large part of the profits are held in surpluses.

This is the crux of our failure to achieve and maintain general prosperity in the midst of plenty. I cannot overemphasize this. It is basic; it is the most potent cause of low wages, of the long workweek, unemployment, poverty, and the threatened collapse of our whole system. In striking at this, we are striking at the root of the economic evil. Thus it is not merely a revenue bill we have before us, but an enlightened and tremendously vital effort to bring about an absolutely necessary readjustment of the distribution of income in this country.

In industry, the lowering of costs should be immediately reflected in higher dividends, higher wages, and lower prices to consumers.

Why? First, in the interest of justice to consumers and to labor. Second, in order to stimulate consumption and keep business on an even keel. It needs no argument to make clear the basic fact that in a machine age, with large-scale production, there must be large-scale consumption, and that this is not possible if a large part of the returns from production is put into excessive surpluses.

What happens to such excessive surpluses was clearly and tragically demonstrated in the boom years ending with the collapse in 1929. Business was good; costs were low; profits were high. Surpluses mounted. The speculative fever was rampant—due to excessive profits. New business enterprises were started; investments in stocks and bonds daily increased. These caused a demand for loans. Interest rates soared so high that even conservative firms began loaning from surpluses; these loans got into the stock market; the boom expanded. And then it broke. With the collapse, millions of dollars loaned from surpluses were lost. Thus the excessive surpluses first stimulated speculation and then were lost in the collapse. Every economist will tell you that this money should never have been in the market; that, in fact, it never should have been gotten together in surpluses. Instead, it should have been paid out week after week to labor, or should have been avoided through the lowering of prices to consumers and the increase of legitimate dividends to investors.

If this policy had been followed by big business, the increased purchases by the consuming public and especially by wage earners and investors would have kept business going. There would have been no such monstrous speculative frenzy and no tragic collapse.

As it was the collapse caused the laying off of millions of workers and the partial or complete closing of thousands of plants. Now, one of the great losses suffered by industry was that due to excessive plant expansion. This was one of the ways of avoiding just taxation. The depression closed the new and unnecessary additions to the plants. Obsolescence reduced their value before the slow revival came. Nobody profited; everybody lost.

The tragic mistake that our industrial and business leaders have made during these many years is to think they could play an entirely selfish game and get away with it.

If profits are reflected in larger dividends, all business is stimulated. If profits are shared with labor, more purchasing power is created for the products of industry. This is the basic fact in our machine age. It must be recognized and accepted if our system is not to collapse.

If such a policy were followed, those men and women who are displaced by the machine in one industry would easily and quickly be transferred to other employment, created by increased purchasing power in the hands of workers and of the public generally. We can well employ more people to produce luxuries not for the few but for the multitude. We can support more professional people, more teachers, doctors, dentists, nurses, lawyers. There will be plenty of employment for all, plenty of services to be rendered when the people have incomes that will enable them to live rounded and comfortable lives.

It is clear that taxing excessive surpluses will give a wider distribution of purchasing power to investors. I think it is a fair assumption that taxing excessive surpluses will tend to cause corporations to turn away from the effort to make excessive profits, for there is a peak beyond which dividends cannot safely soar. One of two alternatives will have to be considered as to profits. The first is to share with labor, either through higher wages, a shorter workweek, or direct profit sharing. The second is to reduce prices to consumers. Either is highly desirable from the standpoint of public interest, of business stability, and of the beneficial and far-reaching social effects.

The charge is made that the proposed tax will destroy small businesses. The answer is that the tax does not apply to businesses owned by individuals or in partnership. Small corporations are amply protected. Such a corporation can accumulate approximately 40 percent of its net income without paying a greater tax than it does under the present law. All corporations, large and small, may continue to retain surpluses sufficient for every legitimate need.

The charge is made that stockholders will suffer because in nonprosperous years there will be no surpluses from which to pay dividends. This is untrue, for even a large corporation can put aside as much as 30 percent of its net income for surplus and not pay any higher tax than it does today. This is sufficient surplus to insure stability of income under sound conditions.

I maintain that the tax is sound and fair and is essential as a means of distributing the benefits of the machine age to those who do the work, supply the capital, and purchase the products of the machine. [Applause.]

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF].

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD two tables presented to the committee during the hearings by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, also a table prepared by a concern known as Prentice-Hall, Inc., of New York. The latter table gives information as to the specific taxes on different incomes, is accurate, and is very pertinent to the question under discussion. It will contribute much to the knowledge of the Members when they have an opportunity to examine it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, the demand from the White House that Congress place upon the shoulders of the already overburdened taxpayers of the Nation an additional tax burden of more than eleven hundred millions of dollars brought more sharply to the attention of the public the profligate way in which the national substance is being dissipated by the administration. That public funds—the people's money, if you please—are being flung to the four winds without regard to securing value therefor is a matter of common knowledge, as every community in the Nation can testify.

What is not generally known outside Washington, however, is that this squandering and waste and inefficiency has been raised to the nth degree in the headquarters organizations of the many alphabetical agencies. Verification of this condition from an employee of the Resettlement Administration, who, of course belongs to the Democratic Party, otherwise he would not have the job he holds, came to me sometime ago in the form of a letter, which I quote in part as follows:

We have winked at spending thousands until the music must be faced.

Why not begin in sincerity by trimming some of the useless and worthless agencies? And, for the sake of common decency, begin with the Resettlement Administration, where—

1. The Administration pay roll has reached $2,000,000 per month.

2. Thirteen thousand chairwarmers are doing and duplicating each others' work—and nearly all of it useless work.

Third. Eight hundred and ninety-four persons in the administration engaged in "management", but so far no one has been able to find out what they manage.

Fourth. More than 3,500 employees of Resettlement are receiving salaries in excess of civil-service ratings—all because they have pull and friends.

Fifth. The Administration's construction division is spending for labor to the tune of $30,000 per day—enough to build at least 10 low-cost houses, but does not build 10 houses a month.

Sixth. Hundreds of the higher salaried employees know that they are on dignified relief, but why dish out relief at the rate of $2,500 to $5,000 per year per person?

Seventh. Of all the headaches the present administration will have will be the one when the public finds out what a disorganized, far-flung, wasteful agency the Resettlement is.

Eighth. You may be interested in knowing that many have left the Resettlement to save their self-respect, and the writer of this will do so soon.

The report of the committee, submitted by Mr. Bell, Acting Director of the Bureau of the Budget, containing information relative to the program of the Resettlement Administration is most illuminating. This information was obtained from statements furnished by Professor Tugwell, the administrator himself. The report will be found on pages 705 to 707 of the hearings and a reading of this report will, I believe, confirm the information conveyed to me in the letter quoted above.

The Resettlement Administration is the agency referred to as "Utopia unlimited" in a series of articles appearing recently in the Washington Post. It is an agency established without specific authorization of Congress and was brought into existence by Executive order of the President. To this activity, or shall I say "inactivity" has been allocated by the President the staggering sum of $278,347,171.29. With this money, or a part of it at least, Professor Tugwell has proceeded to employ, according to his report, 16,943 persons at an aggregate expense to the taxpayers each year of $24,380,985 for salaries alone.

Thirteen thousand four hundred and eighty-one of these individuals are employed "in the field"; so, of course, travel and subsistence expense for them must be no small item. The Resettlement Administration has all the powers of a government within a government, and Professor Tugwell can hire and fire to his heart's content, although it would seem that the gentleman knows much about hiring, but mighty little about firing.

As nearly as we can gather from the sentimental and gushing pronouncements regarding its origin and purposes, emanating from its publicity division, the philosophy pursued is that by shifting people around from where they are to where Dr. Tugwell thinks they ought to be, somehow in the process the subjects of his experimentation will realize the "more abundant life."

An illustration of this theory working out in practice is seen in the Matanuska Valley project in Alaska, involving transfer of 200 families from Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, where they had established themselves, to the rim of the Arctic Circle, where they were allotted farms of 40 acres per family upon which they, I understand, assumed mortgages of $6,000 each, not one of which can ever be paid, even in part, but where, according to the "brain trusters", agricultural conditions are almost ideal.

To date the Government has spent approximately $18,000 per family. Not a crop has been raised, and already 33 families have thrown up their hands, given it up as a bad job, and have returned home. It is prophesied by one of Alaska's newspapermen, who has been there for years and who knows the situation far better than any theoretical bureaucrat in Washington can possibly know it, that very few of the colonists will be in Matanuska at this time next year.

The Matanuska experiment is only one of many under way. Information coming to us regarding these other projects is replete with instances of similar unsatisfactory conditions which point to ultimate failure, with the result of shocking waste of the public funds with no permanent benefit to anyone.

An even more startling discrepancy between the cost to the taxpayers and the benefits to the recipients of the favors being spread around greets the inquirer who looks into the fiscal affairs of Professor Tugwell's Administration. Administration costs have been, according to the best information I can secure, $13,000 to provide benefits to the needy of less than $2,500. The reason for this is vividly set forth in the letter from which I quoted earlier in my remarks. This would seem to indicate that the relief extended by this agency is confined principally to the relief extended to those upon the Resettlement pay roll.

The daily statement of the United States Treasury dated April 20, 1936, disclosed the fact that, of the money allocated to the Resettlement Administration, there was of that date the sum of $173,646,075.56 unexpended. If the Committee is really desirous of securing the amount of money called for by the President—which, of course, the bill will not provide—I suggest that they induce President Roosevelt to issue an Executive order putting an end to the fantastic activities of the Resettlement Administration, fire bodily Professor Tugwell himself and all his 16,943 assistants, and cover back into the Treasury's general fund the $173,646,000 while this sum is still available.

There is a well-known axiom that "a dollar saved is a dollar earned." Here is an opportunity to actually secure this magnificent amount of money without delay and without taxing our people in this amount. I commend this suggestion to the earnest consideration of the majority members of the Committee.

There are many other activities of the Administration, entirely without congressional sanction, involving the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars, of no economic need or benefit, and which cannot be justified even upon a basis of extending relief to the unemployed.

Certainly, in the expenditure of the taxpayers' money for public works, some regard should be shown for the necessity of the project. We should, at least, attempt to secure a dollar's worth for every dollar spent. In every community in this country there are schools which should be built; roads constructed; grade crossings built, in order to protect the lives and property of our people; sewers built and extended, that the health of our communities may be further protected. There are other projects which can be undertaken with the knowledge that the coming generations, who will be called upon to pay much the larger part of all this, will receive some benefit from these expenditures. Work projects should be confined to activities of this character; boondoggling should cease.

Nor should there be begun other projects such as the Florida ship canal or the automobile highway now being built down the Florida Keys, without the contribution of a single penny by the State of Florida and about which no information can be secured in the city of Washington, but which will cost many millions of dollars of the money of the people of all the States.

While the former is an engineering feasibility, the usefulness of the canal, if it is ever completed, will never be such as to, even in a small part, justify its cost, if the opinion of shipping officials can be relied upon.

Passamaquoddy, the economic joke of all the many economic jokes of this administration, which the President, after allocating several million dollars for its development out of the four billion eight hundred and eighty million the Congress so obligingly placed in his hands, has dumped the whole proposition into the lap of Congress and is now demanding that we accept the responsibility and furnish the funds for its completion. Congress has wisely declined to do this.

Mr. Chairman, various engineers from time to time have surveyed this proposition and in every instance have refused to put their stamp of approval upon its possible economic success. The declared purpose of the development is the production of electricity. Every engineer with any knowledge of the facts and the cost of this development will agree that electricity so developed will cost several times as much as it can be purchased for now at that point.

I suggest that anyone in doubt as to the accuracy of this statement take the trouble to examine the books. They will find that in order to justify this expenditure, one-third of the cost is being charged to "relief", one-third to the production of electricity, and one-third to "the national defense." Just how this development will contribute to the national defense has not as yet been disclosed. Is it any wonder that the President has repudiated this brain child and its twin, the Florida canal, and that Congress has refused to take unto its bosom these two unfortunate children left on its doorstep?

I think we all remember the avidity with which the administration seized upon the creation of the great "shelterbelt" of forest a mile wide and running north and south for 1,100 miles through the Prairie States. Presenting, as it did, another funnel through which could be poured into the administration's economic ashcan many other hundred millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money, it was received with enthusiastic acclaim by the spenders of the administration. This proposal, accepted without investigation, and without the realization that a shelterbelt of trees even a mile wide would furnish little protection to that great expanse of prairie land, was heralded as the solution of the dust storms which have so sorely beset that section of the country in the last few years. Fortunately for the taxpayers, and before much money had been expended, the difficulties of making trees grow in that land, upon which trees, as we in Michigan know them, had never grown, together with the belated realization of the utter absurdity of the whole thing, became so apparent that it evidently has been abandoned. It is difficult to find anyone in the administration who even wishes to talk about it.

Other activities of the administration, both unwise and expensive should, it seems to me, be given consideration at a time when this House is considering a proposition of further increasing the tax upon our people. Certainly we who are sent here from the four corners of this great land to look after the economic welfare of the people who send us here, should not in the slightest degree unnecessarily increase the burdens of those whom we represent. If by properly conserving the money already at our disposal, if by eliminating every expense not necessary to our economic life, if by eliminating boondoggling activities, if by refusing at this time to construct great works at a cost of hundreds of millions in the mere hope that in the dim and distant future they may contribute to the economic welfare; if by doing these things we may meet the financial obligations of the Nation without adding to the tax burdens of our constituents, should we not do so?

Mr. Chairman, one cannot address himself to this subject, it seems to me, and bring every relevant thing into the picture without referring at some length to certain activities now being engaged in by the administration, which vitally affect the everyday life and the economic welfare of the great agricultural class of the country. It is conceded by every informed person, I think, that upon the welfare of the farmers depends in large degree the welfare of all other classes of our citizenship.

That the administration appears to recognize this fact seems to be indicated by some of the things that have been done in the name of agricultural relief. However, certain other things have been and are now being done which more than offset all the good which the American farmer may have received through the medium of the A. A. A. contracts.

I refer to two things, Mr. Chairman: First, while with one hand we have been taxing our people on the very necessities of life, through the processing taxes, to raise the money with which to pay the farmers for taking millions of acres of good farm land out of production, we are with the other hand spending hundreds of millions in the West to bring into production other millions of acres, which up to this time have produced nothing of agricultural value.

It is a recognized fact that these arid sections can, under irrigation, year after year produce more than can be produced on the nonirrigated sections, and why not? Sunshine pours down on them every day, all day. Under irrigation, whenever water is needed, it is turned on; when enough is had, it is turned off. These conditions eliminate many of the hazards of farming.

These lands are valuable, of course. There is no question but that they will be needed in the future when our population shall have increased to the point where the farms now available and now producing can no longer supply the food necessities of our people. But how can we justify taxing our people, our already overburdened farmers, if you please, in order that we may bring into existence these great irrigation projects which can only intensify the almost insurmountable difficulties which already face these farmers?

The other thing to which I referred a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, is the problem presented to the farmers and to the country by the so-called fair-trade agreements under which we are surrendering our markets to the foreign producer. A study of our imports during the last year and a half discloses some very disturbing information. The increase in imports of farm products in the past year is shocking. The following information discloses the seriousness of the situation:

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I shall insert tables showing the imports and exports of certain farm products for the years 1934 and 1935. I commend them to the attention of the Members of the House.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I prefer not to yield.

Mr. BUCK. I wish the gentleman would clarify the official nature of these tables; are they official tables?

Mr. WOODRUFF. They are taken from the official reports.

The tables referred to follow:

		1934	1935
Exports:
Wheat	bushels	35,000,000	20,000,000
Tobacco	pounds	427,000,000	341,000,000
Lard	do	66,000,000	10,000,000
Pork	do	140,000,000	120,000,000
Imports:
Butter	do	689,000	21,000,000
Fresh beef	do	233,000	4,575,000
Fodder	do	113,000,000	354,000,000
Total meats	do	40,546,000	73,763,000
Wheat	bushels	10,596,000	23,603,000
Rice	pounds	35,411,000	80,376,000
Beans	do	12,500,000	35,600,000
Tomatoes	do	46,000,000	77,000,000
Onions	do	3,900,000	13,500,000

Mr. WOODRUFF. It will be seen that while there was a substantial reduction in our exports, there was a shockingly large increase in our imports of these agricultural commodities. Certainly, any program which permits the farmer to be assailed upon the one hand by the foreign producers, and upon the other by the competition of an always increasing number of irrigation projects, which he is taxed to pay for, can hardly be considered a program wholly in his interest.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the proposed repeal of the corporation-income tax, the capital-stock tax, and the excess-profits tax, with the definite loss of $1,100,000,000 revenue, and the enactment of an entirely new system of taxation is, in view of the acknowledged uncertain productivity of the latter, an undertaking so hazardous in these days of enormous and profligate expenditures as to make it most unwise. Many of the older Members will remember the difficulties we have had in stopping the holes in the law through which taxpayers have escaped a fair tax. After many years of effort we have produced a law which is fairly satisfactory.

In this bill we are embarking upon another long period of experimentation. Not in the history of the world, so far as we know, has any nation found such a law satisfactory. The bill presents heretofore unknown tax complexities. Its one certain accomplishment will be the employment of vast numbers of lawyers to aid the taxpayers in unraveling the mysteries and the technicalities presented. I prophesy the early repeal of the law, and that instead of being known to future generations as the "Revenue Act of 1936" it will be known as the act to relieve the legal profession.

Mr. Chairman, the public is supposed to believe that the purpose and effect of this bill is to force dividends out of the treasuries of the corporations into the pockets of the rich, thereby forcing those with large incomes into higher income-tax brackets, and compelling them to pay a much larger share of the tax of the country than they have heretofore paid. I do not believe it will have this effect, for reasons I shall now present.

The income tax, with its exemptions and its graduated scale of taxation, is in my judgment the fairest tax that has yet been devised. Its purpose, of course, is to compel every taxpayer to pay in proportion to his ability to pay. It has been successfully applied up to a certain point. Unfortunately the existence of tax-exempt bonds of the Federal Government, the States, and all political subdivisions thereof present an avenue of escape for taxpayers in the higher brackets, thereby preventing the application of the tax upon the very wealthy in full measure. I shall at this point place in the RECORD the tables supplied the committee, at my request, showing the wholly tax-exempt and partially tax-exempt securities outstanding and available to those who desire to escape the higher income taxes.

For instance, a taxable income of $250,000 represents an investment of $4,333,333 in business and productive enterprise at a dividend rate of 6 percent. The income tax on this $250,000 is $128,294. This sum, subtracted from the $250,000, leaves a balance or net income of $121,706 on the investment. The same sum invested in tax-exempt securities at 3½ percent would net the taxpayer $143,892, or $22,186 more than he would receive if he should leave his money invested in enterprises which provide jobs for American wage earners. In other words, the present conditions and the availability of tax-exempt securities as an avenue of investment present to the taxpayer with this amount of money to invest an inducement of $22,186 per year to invest his money in the last-named securities. The larger the sum available for investment, the larger the inducement to the taxpayer to take his money out of productive enterprise.

I will insert in the RECORD at this time a short table showing how rapidly this inducement increases in amount as the sum invested becomes larger:

Taxable income derived from investment at 6 percent	Tax	Net income after tax	Yield from investment of same capital in 3½ percent bonds	Inducement to invest in tax-exempt bonds
$500,000	304,144	195,856	291,666	95,810
$1,000,000	679,044	320,966	583,333	262,377

There is another inducement which the prudent investor rarely overlooks, and that is the fact that there are none of the hazards of business connected with investment in carefully selected tax-exempt securities. The result of this situation is that by far the larger share of the more wealthy citizens do not today have their money invested in corporations, their income from which would be subjected to the higher income-tax brackets. A certain amount is so invested, yes; but when it becomes profitable to enter the avenue of tax escape through this other line of investment, the way is open, the hand of economy, frugality, thrift, careful management of resources, selfishness—whatever you care to call it—beckons and the taxpayer enters.

Mr. Chairman, there is nothing the Congress can do about this so long as it remains possible for the Federal Government, the States, and the subdivisions of the States to issue bonds and other securities the income from which is immune from taxation. Neither the measure before us nor any other law the Congress can enact can in itself change this situation. The 48 States of this Union constitute the only authority which can put an end to this intolerable condition. And they can only do so after the Congress has adopted and sent to them a constitutional amendment correcting this situation.

At different times, before and since the inauguration of President Roosevelt, he has directed attention to this situation and made note of the fact that many of our more wealthy people were, through this medium, escaping their fair share of the national tax burden. In his tax message of June 19, 1935, he made the following statement:

> I renew, however, at this time the recommendations made by my predecessors for the submission and ratification of a constitutional amendment whereby the Federal Government will be permitted to tax the income on subsequently issued State and local securities, and likewise for the taxation by the State and local governments of future issues of Federal securities.

At the time the President sent this message to Congress the law provided a maximum of 55-percent surtax on individual incomes. That he was fully alive to the ineffectiveness of the higher surtaxes is indicated by his statement quoted above. And yet in that same message he stated:

> The disturbing effect upon our national life that comes from great inheritances of wealth and power can in the future be reduced, not only through the method I have just described but through a definite increase in the taxes now levied upon very great individual net incomes.

He knew, of course, that surtaxes as high as 55 percent were ineffective; that they had already driven hundreds of the larger income owners into the tax-exempt field; that we were not even then securing the amount of revenue from the rich we had every right to expect; he must have known that to raise the surtaxes before a constitutional amendment had been submitted to and adopted by the States would result in driving hundreds of others to the protection of the tax-exempt fields of investment, with a consequent loss to the Treasury. But that bill, my friends, was to be known to all and sundry as the great Roosevelt "soak the rich" tax bill; the uninformed were to be convinced that the millennium had arrived, and that at last this class were to be compelled to bear their share of this tax burden. To convince them of this it was necessary that the surtaxes be again boosted so that the orators of the party could go forth in the following election and make their campaigns upon this false premise.

The last two Congresses have not without ample cause become known as "rubber stamp" Congresses. Our friends on the other side have without exception speedily enacted every measure seriously suggested to them by the President of the United States. There has been no time when rebellion in their ranks, regardless of their personal opinions, has in the slightest degree threatened the enactment of even one of the well-known "must" measures. The President knows this. I am sure he has a high appreciation of the splendid cooperation he has received at the hands of Congress. I am sure, also, that he is fully aware that if he were to seriously ask the leaders of this House and the leaders of another body to put through the two Houses of Congress a resolution submitting to the States the constitutional amendment mentioned above it would be done immediately.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Michigan 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I ask the gentleman from Michigan how many of these so-called "must" bills the gentleman from Michigan has voted against.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I will say to my friend from the State of Washington that I believe I have voted against all of them during the last 2 years. I, along with a great many other good citizens of this country, believed the President of the United States when he subscribed to the Democratic platform which, among other things, provided that—

> We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance, to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent in the cost of Federal Government.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman voted for most of the "must" legislation, did he not?

Mr. WOODRUFF. No; I have not voted for most of the "must" legislation. So far as I remember, I voted against all of them during the last two years and a half.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Did the gentleman vote against the N. R. A.?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I was persuaded to do so upon the promise of the President that if after trying an experiment and finding it unsatisfactory he would abandon it. It seems that none of the New Deal experiments have been unsatisfactory except the shelterbelt, as none of the others have willingly been abandoned.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Did the gentleman vote against the A. A. A.?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I voted for that, I will say to my friend from Washington.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. And how about the tax bill of 1934?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes; I voted for that tax bill because I had not yet become persuaded that unrivaled extravagance and waste was to take the place of the promised economy. I, along with a great many other Members on this side of the House, during the first few months of the present administration, acting upon the belief we were going to have some sanity in government, some efficiency in the administration of the laws enacted by Congress, believing it was our patriotic duty to help rather than hinder the Presidential efforts to bring about better conditions for our people, voted to give the President what he asked for. By so doing we set an example to our Democratic friends which they can well follow after the coming election. It has not been forgotten that their actions during the last Republican administration were the reverse of ours.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Did the gentleman vote for the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the banking legislation?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I may say that I was very happy to vote for the Federal deposit-insurance law because for years I had advocated such a law. I think it is one of the finest laws that has been put upon statute books of this country in many years.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I make the observation that the Federal Deposit Insurance Act was passed by this House against the wishes of the President of the United States. It was not on the "must" list.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I am very glad the gentleman called attention to that fact.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is evidence that the Congress is not a complete rubber stamp.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I may say there are exceptions possibly that prove all rules. May I call the attention of the gentleman from Washington to the fact just called to my attention by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I am glad to be able to confirm what the gentleman said because I was informed by one of the very eminent Members on that side of the House that this Congress passed the F. D. I. C. over the violent protest of the President of the United States.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I never heard of that and the President did approve the bill.

Mr. WOODRUFF. We know that no President in his good senses could possibly have disapproved a bill of that character.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, may I say, too, in that connection that the country pretty generally and very properly credits the junior Senator from the great State of Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] with being responsible for the other body of this Congress having adopted that particular bill.

Mr. SPENCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I have already taken up too much time, but I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SPENCE. May I suggest to the gentleman that the Republican platform of 1932 violently criticized the F. D. I. C.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I do not recall that, but the gentleman will agree with me that the junior Senator from Michigan is big enough, wise enough, and honest enough to follow his good judgment and his conscience in matters so vitally affecting the welfare of the American people.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], 10 long years ago, introduced such a resolution. He has reintroduced it in each succeeding Congress. It is now reposing quietly in the Judiciary Committee of this House, and notwithstanding frequent urgings, the committee has up to this time declined to even hold hearings on the resolution. Does anyone think that should the President ask for the immediate consideration of this resolution that the amiable, distinguished chairman of that great committee would for one instant refuse such a request? We all know he would not. So, Mr. Chairman, what are we waiting for? Why are we not doing the thing we so clearly should do? Why does not the President send up a "must" message on this subject if he is seriously in earnest about this matter? Why is not this done now in order that the principle of the graduated income tax may apply to all alike, and that the rich as well as the poor may be taxed in proportion to their ability to pay? It has not been done up to now, and I am satisfied it will not be done at this time. Why it is not done, I shall leave to the majority to explain.

The bill before us is another measure similar to the tax bill of 1935, and is also designed to convince the uninformed that through this medium you are going to again soak the rich. All of us here must, of course, realize that this is just another case of "tilting at windmills", and that all other attempts of like character will be as barren of supposedly desired results as this.

Every Member of this House should know that the tax on the rich will not be increased. If there should be an increase of revenue resulting from the enactment of the bill, it necessarily follows that this increased revenue will be paid by those other than the rich.

On yesterday the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] disclosed many ways in which revenue can be saved and not cripple any legitimate function of government nor withhold any necessary money for relief. I have suggested others, and I commend these suggestions to the Members of this House. Courageous, intelligent action along the lines suggested will make unnecessary any tax bill at this time. Such action would enable us to more nearly approach a balanced Budget than the bill before us, even though the revenue it produces far exceeds the fondest hopes of its proponents.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against this bill. I shall vote no more taxes upon an already overburdened people until such time as sanity in expenditures returns to this Government. Wild, wasteful, unnecessary spending seems to be limited only by the funds on hand or that can be raised by further increasing the national debt, which is now at a high peak for all time. These wasters, these "boondogglers", seem to forget that every dollar spent must be earned by someone. They forget that every dollar of tax extracted from the pockets of the toilers and others means $1 less that can be spent for the necessities of life. They overlook the fact that as taxes increase, the standard of living of our people decreases. They have piled upon us debts that cannot be paid in a lifetime, and the end is not yet. Anticipating, I suppose, their future desire for the money, the administration asked and received at the hands of this complaisant Congress the authority to increase the national debt to $45,000,000,000, and this, my friends, is something for all of us to think about, but more particularly should the youth of the country ponder this and realize what such an eventuality will mean to them and the generations to come after them.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein certain portions of the minority report.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, under this permission I insert in the RECORD a summary of the fundamental objections to the bill as reported in the minority report. I concur in these views. They are as follows:

SUMMARY OF OBJECTIONS

1. It will discourage and possibly prevent the accumulation of adequate rainy day reserves and constitutes a direct threat to the security of business, employment, and investments.

2. It will cause corporations to restrict the distribution of their existing tax-paid reserves, which can only be rebuilt under penalty.

3. It will discourage business rehabilitation and expansion and have a retarding effect upon recovery and reemployment.

4. It will hamper the growth of small corporations, impede the development of new enterprises, and foster monopolies.

5. It puts a penalty on prudence and a bounty on improvidence and constitutes an unwholesome interference with the exercise of sound judgment in the management of business.

6. It will accentuate the extremes of future booms and depressions.

7. It will oppress businesses burdened with debts and will result in a restriction on corporate credit.

8. It will drive capital out of productive enterprise into tax-exempt securities.

9. It violates every sound principle of income taxation, is arbitrary and oppressive in its application, and will be unequal and discriminating in its operation.

10. It will crucify financially weak business enterprises, while permitting the strong to minimize or entirely escape the tax.

11. It will create inequities and unfair competitive situations which are far greater and more real than the imaginary ones it purports to correct.

12. It will result in the double taxation of all dividends paid out of reserves, whether accumulated in the past or in the future.

13. It will cause untold confusion and add bewildering complexities both in the computation and administration of the tax.

14. It abandons an assured revenue of $1,100,000,000 annually for one purely speculative and uncertain, and which promises to be most disappointing in amount, thereby further jeopardizing the Federal revenue.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, it is not with any thought that I can hope to add to the very able and thorough presentations of the pending tax bill by preceding speakers that I take the floor at this time, but it is rather for the purpose of explaining my position that I do so.

From the moment that the President sent his tax message to Congress on March 3, I have maintained that the imposition of new taxes at this time is both unwise and unnecessary. Unwise in that additional taxes will very materially retard recovery; unnecessary in that it is possible for the administration to effect such economies in the conduct of the Government as to obviate the necessity for new taxes at this time.

I yield to no Member of the House in my desire to place the finances of the Government upon a sound business footing. I am in favor of going onto a pay-as-we-go basis. That would be good business. There is no doubt in my mind that we are wasting much more money than we can hope to raise through the passage of this measure.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOOK. I notice the gentleman mentioned the fact he was in favor of the pay-as-we-go basis.

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. HOOK. I should like to ask the gentleman whether his party was in favor of that proposition when they turned over the $5,000,000,000 deficit to the present administration?

Mr. KNUTSON. May I say to the gentleman that when we took over the Government from the Democrats in 1921 the national debt was in excess of $25,000,000,000. When we turned it back to you in 1933 the national debt was only $21,000,000,000. [Applause.]

Mr. HOOK. What was the national debt when it was turned over by the Republican Party to the Wilson administration?

Mr. KNUTSON. We owed about a billion dollars.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman make an estimate of what he expects the Democratic debt will be when the Democratic Party turns the Government back to the Republican Party next January?

Mr. KNUTSON. I cannot answer that question, because I am not a crystal gazer; but I may say it will be plenty. The chances are that by the 1st of July the total Federal debt will be three and a half billion dollars in excess of the total value of all the farms, buildings, and farm equipment in the United States, which is not a very pleasant situation to contemplate.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. All that the gentleman says about the national debt in 1921 is substantially correct. But does the gentleman now criticize the Government for the necessity of incurring the national debt which grew out of our participation in the World War?

Mr. KNUTSON. May I say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I voted against our going into the World War because I believed in helping the Democrats keep the promise which they made to the American people in the campaign of 1916 to the effect that "a vote for Woodrow Wilson is a vote to keep the American people out of the war", and I considered that a plebiscite.

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, the gentleman has not answered the question. Does the gentleman condemn and criticize the expenses which this Government incurred in connection with the conduct of the World War?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes, sir. Look at Hog Island and all the other grafts connected therewith. I maintain that we should have stayed out of the World War.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is speaking for his party?

Mr. KNUTSON. My dear sir, the scandals that grew out of the corruption and mistakes of the World War smelled to the high heavens.

Mr. McCORMACK. Is the gentleman speaking for his party?

Mr. KNUTSON. I am speaking for myself. I do not assume to speak for my party; no.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If I remember the figures correctly, the report of the United States Treasury showed that when we entered the war in 1917, we had a Federal debt of $1,250,000,000.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is substantially correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Which rose to about $26,000,000,000.

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. During the Republican administration, between 1920 and 1932, that debt was reduced down to about sixteen and one-quarter billion dollars.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And taxes were reduced some four or five times during that period.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is true.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Now, in connection with this tax bill, we are starting out with a debt, we will say, at the present time of $32,000,000,000.

Mr. KNUTSON. I thought it was a little more than that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Thirty-four and a half billion dollars, I am informed, on June 30 of this year. During the period from 1913 to 1934, we paid out in interest on Federal debt, in round figures, $14,000,000,000.

Now, if recovery is accomplished during the next 3 or 4 years, and we start out with a base debt of $34,000,000,000 at the present time, and interest rates go up materially—we are now borrowing money at as low a rate as three-fourths of 1 percent—what will our interest burden be in the next 15 years, and how much additional tax will have to be imposed upon the American taxpayer in order to meet the interest load alone?

Mr. KNUTSON. I would suggest to my good friend from Michigan that he propound that question to some astronomer, because it would take astronomical figures to answer it.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. The amount of $34,500,000,000, according to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, does not include the $6,000,000,000 of commitments.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is true. The debt will be substantially about $40,000,000,000 if we include the commitments.

Mr. REED of New York. And it does not include the cost of completing the projects started under the boondoggling fund of $4,000,000,000 which have just been started, where there is a moral, if not a legal, obligation to continue such projects. Only the starting of these projects has been paid for, and the balance will fall on the next generation of taxpayers.

Mr. KNUTSON. I do not want to take the position of maintaining that a certain amount of relief is not necessary. On both sides of the aisle we want to take care of the worthy needy, but what we do object to is that for every dollar we spend for relief half of it goes to the cost of administration, and we consider that excessive. [Applause.]

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. The gentleman will recall the mayor of Pittsburgh, who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and finally was not permitted to go ahead with his testimony, and the gentleman will recall the eminent Mr. Johnson, a fine, splendid, educated, and cultured gentleman, who had been in business all his life, who stated he was not appearing there in a partisan capacity at all. He said that 50 cents out of every dollar spent in Pennsylvania by this administration on public works and boondoggling had been totally wasted.

Mr. McCORMACK. Is that Andy Mellon's side-kick the gentleman is referring to?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman has referred to the debt reduction that was made after his party took charge in 1921. I am certain the gentleman from Minnesota, who is eminently fair, will recognize the fact that more than three and a half billion dollars of the debt reduction is evidenced in the sale of surplus war supplies and principal and interest payments on foreign loans received during that period.

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, I did not attempt to break it down, and I thank the gentleman for having broken it down for me.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I am always pleased to yield to my good-natured friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman favors relief at the present time, does he not?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Did the gentleman's party give relief prior to the inauguration of President Roosevelt?

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, I think so; yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Where?

Mr. KNUTSON. All over the country.

Mr. McCORMACK. You relieved the big fellow, but what did you do for the fellow out of a job?

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, the same old cry.

Mr. McCORMACK. The same old Republican cry, "Let the poor fellow take care of himself and suffer", and the gentleman knows that is correct. The Federal Government never appropriated a penny to relieve human suffering and distress prior to March 4, 1933.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Certainly; I yield to my chairman.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I just want to remind my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], a member of the Ways and Means Committee, who referred to the testimony of the mayor of Pittsburgh, that somewhere or other I have seen it stated in the papers since that time that they have had him in jail.

Mr. REED of New York. I am not surprised—he is a leading Democrat of that city. [Laughter.]

Mr. KNUTSON. And it is my information he is coming to Congress next year.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. As a Republican?

Mr. KNUTSON. No; as a Democrat.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Oh, no.

Mr. KNUTSON. A Jeffersonian Democrat, but not a new dealer.

We are told that one of the primary purposes of this bill is to compel the distribution of corporate reserves. Is that wise? Every Member of this body knows of some business organization that has been enabled to operate during the depression because it had a reserve to fall back upon. According to the Department of Commerce, American business, from 1930 to 1934, inclusive, paid out twenty-six and six-tenths billions more than they took in. This they could not have done had they not had reserves to draw upon. Bear in mind that this vast sum was paid out for labor, taxes, and raw material. Had these reserves not been available many and many would have been compelled to close down, and that would have greatly aggravated our already serious unemployment and relief problems.

There are those who labor under the impression that these surpluses have not paid any taxes to the Government, when as a matter of fact there was paid upon all of them a Federal tax running from 12½ to 15 percent. With the proposed tax law in effect, I venture the prediction that the next depression will result in much greater unemployment and in much smaller production than has obtained during this depression.

We hear a great deal said about reserves being piled up in order to avoid taxes. There doubtless are cases of that kind, but I venture the assertion, without fear of contradiction, that a large proportion of the reserves were built up for expansion purposes and to enable the company to weather economic storms. In short, reserves are nothing more or less than life-insurance policies of business.

Under the operation of this law hundreds of millions of dollars in dividends will be distributed to stockholders. Much of this money will go to individuals who are in the higher-income brackets. They will have to reinvest that money, and it does not take very much imagination to foresee that the greater part will be invested in tax-exempt securities, where it will no longer be available for operation and expansion of industry.

As I see it, this legislation is going to jeopardize small business. It is a significant fact that no big corporations are opposing this legislation, the reason being that the big corporations will have no difficulty in securing ample financing in future depressions. The opposition to this tax bill comes from smaller business concerns who do not have strong banking connections and they fear that they will have to throw themselves upon the mercy of the big banks for future financing. Those who will be unable to secure such financing must of necessity shut down and, of course, that will only benefit their big competitors. So it will be seen that this tax law will foster and promote monopolies. In support of this statement I call to your attention observations Mr. Noel Sargent, secretary, National Association of Manufactures, made before the Ways and Means Committee, which are to be found on page 213 of the hearings. I quote:

> I know of one manufacturer, for example, who tells me that his company and one other in his industry are in a sound financial position and that they are inclined to favor the pending proposal because it would drive their weaker competitors out of business.

In support of Mr. Sargent's statement let me quote a statement made by President Roosevelt last June:

> The drain of a depression upon the reserves of business puts a disproportionate strain upon the modestly capitalized small enterprise. Without such small enterprise our competitive economic society would cease.

Then, again, I should like to quote from a radio address made by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee on March 26, who, when speaking of the proposed new tax, said:

> An ample part of earnings can be reserved for surplus without a higher tax being paid than is being paid under the present law.

It was testified to in the hearings on the tax bill that only three countries—Belgium, Sweden, and Norway—have ever had such a tax. I have taken the trouble to confer with Norwegian businessmen on how the tax has worked in that country, and without exception they state that it has operated to the injury of Norwegian industry because they now have difficulty in financing the replacement of obsolescent machinery and equipment, as well as for expansion. It may be pertinent at this point to state that Sweden repealed her tax on undistributed profits several years ago.

It is generally conceded that the Hollanders are among the shrewdest and most thrifty people. In Holland they have exactly the reverse of an undistributed earnings tax. There they levy a tax on profits distributed by companies to their shareholders. That is as it should be. That is sound.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to my friend from Washington.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he omitted mention of Norway.

Mr. KNUTSON. I have quoted a Norwegian businessman.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman does not distinguish any difference in principle between the Norwegian system, which uses the distribution of income as the yardstick, and that proposed here, which uses undistributed income as the yardstick. In principle it is the same proposition.

Mr. KNUTSON. The principle may be the same but the effect is different.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In this bill we have tables 1 and 1A. One (1) is where we take the undistributed income and work to the tax, and in the other (1A) we work from the dividend back to the tax.

Mr. KNUTSON. Let me answer the gentleman. In Norway they have such a law as we here propose. At the time when business was good in Norway they imposed a 10 percent tax on undistributed profits. The result was unsatisfactory and aroused general public opposition because it materially weakened the resistance of business and industry. As a result this tax has been reduced and very probably will soon be repealed in its entirety. As the gentleman knows, Norway is one of the large maritime countries of the world. As a result of the tax they have in Norway, shipping interests are unable to finance the building of new ships because they have no surplus to draw upon.

Now, I do not state this for a certainty, but my recollection is that as a result of the tax law Norway has lost control of the nitrate industry of that country. Being compelled to distribute the surpluses, when the time came to extend and replace equipment they were obliged to go abroad to do their financing.

One of the dangers that I see in this legislation—and if I am wrong I should like to have the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] set me right—is that it is going to put small business concerns that have no big banking connections absolutely at the mercy of the big banking crowd when the time comes when they must secure additional financing.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I shall endeavor to meet that question in my own time. But going back to the shipping industry, the gentleman says that in Norway their law dealt with distribution, and hampered the shipping industry so that it did not have reserves or surplus with which to build up new ships. Does not that same thing apply under existing law here? Have the shipping interests here sufficient money to expand their business as they want to?

Mr. KNUTSON. No; they have not; because the law has handicapped them in their operations.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I am speaking of this country.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, yes. Here they have been permitted under the law to build up surpluses that would carry them through a business stress.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. But they have not had enough money to expand as they want, and they have come to Congress and have asked subsidies insofar as the increase of ships is concerned.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman must know that American shipping has never had a fair chance since the passage of the so-called Seamen's Act away back about 1916 or 1917. The restrictions that are placed upon American shipping under that act are so onerous that American shipping has never had a chance to develop as have English, German, French, Norwegian, and Japanese shipping.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And that has been done under our existing tax structure.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, there is more than one way of skinning a cat. This particular cat was skinned by the Shipping Act of 1916. Our merchant marine has not had a chance to pile up a surplus because they did not do the necessary business to enable them to do so.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; to my friend.

Mr. HOLMES. Is it not the gentleman's observation that most of these smaller business corporations are going to be at the mercy of the banks if this legislation is passed?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; this is a big banker's measure.

Mr. HOLMES. If they are to be called upon to pay up to 30 percent of their profits in taxes, and the banks force them to pay their bank loans, there will be thousands and thousands of bankruptcies of that type.

Mr. KNUTSON. What I fear from this legislation is that it will drive the small fellow to the wall the next time we have a financial storm. Some of them will not last until the next storm. It may be, Mr. Chairman, that we are not taxing corporations high enough. I will not discuss that point, because I do not know, but if we are not taxing them sufficiently at the present time, then let us raise the rates up to 22½ percent or more, if need be, as has been proposed before the committee.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. REED of New York. The gentleman will recall that a prominent banker from Chicago appeared before our committee, who is also on the finance committee of the United States Chamber of Commerce. He testified that if this bill passed in its present form it would be necessary for the banks in the country to reexamine all the loans they now hold against business enterprises.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am not a banker, so I cannot pass judgment on his testimony.

The gentleman can foresee the strain that will be placed on the American banking system if all industry, all business is compelled to go to the banks for financing at about the same time. You will absolutely freeze up your credit. That is another objectionable feature to this proposal, as I see it. You will drive all to the banks at one and the same time.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Certainly. My friend from Arkansas is a banker, and perhaps he can throw some light on this phase.

Mr. FULLER. As I remember it, the gentleman is the only Republican on the committee that voted for the soil-conservation program this year. Is not that true?

Mr. KNUTSON. I voted for it.

Mr. FULLER. The gentleman also knows that most of the money has gone for this soil conservation, and to take care of the processing tax, in the interest of agriculture. Will the gentleman please tell us where he could figure out some way for us to get the money better than the program that we have selected?

Mr. KNUTSON. For a starter, I would put up on the auction block that Turkish bathhouse that you built for dogs down in Memphis.

Mr. FULLER. We will give it to you.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Is that all the relief that the gentleman would give the farmer?

Mr. KNUTSON. I would use that as a starter, or as an example, and, as my good friend from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] so well said, I would cut out some of these irrigation projects that are being brought into production, which will greatly aggravate our farm problem. Then I would stop spending money on many of these inland streams, where there is no commerce and where there never will be any commerce.

I can think of so many ways. If the gentleman will come over to my office some afternoon, I think I can show him where we can effect many economies.

Mr. FULLER. I will do that.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I fear that the imposition of the proposed tax will encourage business to increase the outstanding stock which will mean more watered stock to pay dividends on. We all know that the consumer ultimately pays all dividends and the more stock outstanding the greater the cost to the consumer.

Another objectionable feature of the bill before us is that it places a flat tax of 15 percent on banks. It does not look right to me to apply the same tax rate to small banks as is applied to some of the big metropolitan banks, which have assets that run into the hundreds of millions, and in several instances beyond the billion mark. There is no more reason why we should treat all banks alike than that we should treat all individuals alike in the matter of collecting income taxes. We know that under the income-tax law, as the income increases, the taxpayer is moved into the higher brackets until he pays, as I recall, 75 percent. It would not be right to apply the same rate to Henry Ford as is applied to us.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In 1933, with $33,000,000,000 of working assets, I will state to the gentleman that the banks, under existing law, only paid into the Treasury of the United States $2,400,000. I understand the gentleman feels that their tax burden should be greater than that?

Mr. KNUTSON. Correct. I will say to the gentleman I think it is a crime to let the National City Bank and the Chase National Bank escape with a 15-percent tax, when you stop to think that they own all the sugar plantations and mills down in Cuba, and that this administration has reduced the tariff on sugar from Cuba from 2 cents to nine-tenths of 1 cent, which actually constitutes an outright gift to them of something like $42,000,000 a year, as I recall.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. Undoubtedly the gentleman read in the papers where the President-elect of Cuba is making a visit here, and he has stated he is anxious to increase the quota of sugar from Cuba. Does the gentleman think we ought to agree to that?

Mr. KNUTSON. Most assuredly not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, are we now discussing a tariff bill or a revenue bill?

Mr. KNUTSON. Both. We are discussing taxation, and I am merely following the example of my illustrious chief, the gentleman from North Carolina, who made a wonderful stump speech on yesterday. [Laughter.] You Democrats could well use it at your convention as a keynote speech, and I would suggest that you make Mr. DOUGHTON your keynote speaker. [Applause.] But when it comes to that, I think he is one of the best politicians on the floor of this House. I am very fond of him. He is a grand man, sound, and fair.

I do not desire to take more time upon this measure except to say that the opposition is at a disadvantage in discussing the measure because of the fact that the bill contains 249 pages, which was prepared by the majority members of the committee in executive session. The minority had nothing to do with its preparation. As a matter of fact, we did not receive a printed copy of the bill until Monday of this week, and 4 days is hardly sufficient time in which to study and familiarize ourselves on such an intricate subject. Hence my opinions and conclusions are based largely upon the printed hearings.

In connection with the pending measure I wish to submit to the careful consideration of the House membership a suggestion recently advanced by Myron H. Bent, Washington correspondent of the Brooklyn Times Union, which appeared in the issue of that paper on April 14.

Mr. Bent suggests two amendments to the Federal Constitution. One, to fix a limitation on the amount of indebtedness that the Federal Government may incur, the other to set Presidential terms at 6 years, and to make the incumbent ineligible for reelection. To my way of thinking these amendments would greatly improve our situation in that they would remove the greatest hazard of our National Government, the buying of reelection through Federal expenditures that are ofttimes wasteful and unnecessary. I would be happy over the opportunity to vote for their submission.

Before bringing my remarks to a close, I want to commend the chairman and the members of the committee for their faithful and conscientious work. The hearings continued from March 30 to April 7, when we sat past the midnight hour. Regardless of what our personal views may be with reference to this tax bill, I do know that every member of the minority is deeply grateful to Chairman DOUGHTON and the majority members for their uniform courtesy during the hearings. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has consumed 38 minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ECKERT].

Mr. ECKERT. Mr. Chairman, I am one of the very few persons who believe that nature, in every growing community, provides a fund for revenue purposes. Therefore, I feel the bill under consideration, in common with the general run of tax legislation, either State or Federal, violates in large measure the fundamental canons of taxation.

CANONS OF TAXATION

A tax levied for public revenues ought to conform as closely as possible to the following conditions:

First. That it bear as lightly as possible upon production, so as least to check the increase of the general fund from which taxes must be paid and the community maintained.

Second. That it be easily and cheaply collected, and fall as directly as may be upon the ultimate payers, so as to take from the people as little as possible in addition to what it yields the Government.

Third. That it be certain, so as to give the least opportunity for tyranny or corruption on the part of officials, and the least temptation to lawbreaking and evasion on the part of the taxpayers.

Fourth. That it bear equally, so as to give no citizen an advantage or put any at a disadvantage, as compared with others.

Mr. MASSINGALE a few days ago delivered a speech on the floor of this House in which he reminded the Members that—

A state can be laid low just as effectively by wrong ideas as by an invading army, and there is no agency of destruction known to chemists that is half as formidable as the TNT of bad economics.

There is no branch of the social sciences to which this observation applies with greater force than the subject of taxation, for the taxing power of government can be wielded either to kill or to keep alive and therefore tax measures ought to conform as nearly as possible to the fundamental canons of taxation and sound economics. The present bill does not meet these requirements, and hence falls into the same class of tax legislation that now generally obtains. This, of course, must be expected. Inasmuch as public opinion is in a state of confusion on the subject of taxation and not sufficiently syncretized to support the system ordained by Nature, legislators are bound to follow the accepted method for raising public revenues. In all fairness, it must be said that the bill under consideration represents an earnest and conscientious effort to equalize the burden of taxation as well as to increase the public revenues, and for this the majority of the Ways and Means Committee and the committee's distinguished chairman, Mr. DOUGHTON, are to be complimented.

MORE REVENUE NEEDED

The President, in his message of March 3, called attention to the fact that if the policy established in the spring of 1933 of trying to meet the ordinary expenses of government by guaranteed income it will be necessary to raise by some form of permanent taxation an annual amount of $620,000,000. If the request of the President is to be heeded, new sources of revenue will have to be provided, and inasmuch as practically every nook and corner of the economic world has been explored for things to tax, the discovery of a fund that would provide the revenue necessary for the support of government ought to be an event of unbounded joy and delight, especially to those distinguished gentlemen from both sides of the aisle, who for weeks and months have been admonishing the Congress and the country of the danger of debts and taxes. And be it said, their counsel regarding debts and taxes is timely and wise, even if old and commonplace.

Poor Richard, in his day and generation, was loud in his preachments of thrift and enconomy and pointed out the pitfalls and anxieties of notes falling due on Easter. Political parties have been zealous in decrying mounting public debts and high taxes. Efficient government, economically administered, is a stock phrase for party platforms. In fact, all agree that both debts and taxes are unwelcome in either public affairs or private life. And yet nearly everyone is a victim of both. And so it would seem, for the greatest happiness of all, that the one be kept at the lowest possible point and the other in its proper sphere.

Before discussing the low point of debt and the incidence of taxation, let it be known that there may be things even more dangerous than debts and more undesirable than taxes. The complaint is frequently made that the Federal Government is engaged in a spending spree that is not only endangering the Nation's credit but placing upon the backs of the people burdens that are impossible to be borne. But what are the facts? It is true that since 1929 the public debt has been mounting. During the Hoover administration the national debt increased many billion dollars. Since then more billions have been added. But why the increase?

WHY TAXES ARE HIGH

Since 1929 the United States has been experiencing a disastrous economic crisis—a crisis in many respects more devastating than war, and to arrest the ravages of this economic debacle the resources of the Federal Government were brought into action. Financial aid was extended to farmers, home owners, manufacturers, railroads, and financial institutions. Besides, the Government set up a number of governmental agencies to provide work for the unemployed, and in addition, was compelled to assume the relief burden throughout the Nation. During the World War the Federal Government increased the national debt by leaps and bounds. In the absence of conscription of wealth there was nothing else to do. No one seriously objected to the action of the Government then. Why so much criticism now in its efforts to combat an enemy more disquieting than the World War?

Public debts are disturbing. They ought to be created only under stress of dire necessity. Taxes are burdensome and ought to be raised only for proper purposes. But there are some things worse than debts and taxes.

Representative LUDLOW, in discussing the Post Office and Treasury appropriation bill, stated the case of the expenditures of the present administration correcting and eloquently when he said:

> The spending has indeed been enormous—much greater than many of us approved—but regrettable as it is and important as it is that such drafts on the Treasury shall not occur again, there are, after all, some things that are worse than big expenditures. Revolution is worse than big expenditures. Starvation stalking through the land is worse than big expenditures. Who can say that the money paid out so lavishly may not have staved off something immeasurably worse than anything this country has ever experienced? Anyway, the hungry have been fed and the naked have been clothed, and the situation has been handled so that in a depression as black as midnight peace has reigned and the faith of the people in their Government has been maintained.

Of course, government budgets must be kept within sane bounds, but when this policy is observed it is not so much a question of "How large the Budget?" as "What do the people get for their money?"

Let us examine our tax bill with a view of getting a picture of governmental expenditures. The country's total tax bill is approximately $10,000,000,000. Of this sum the Federal Government, in normal times and for ordinary purposes, spends approximately $3,000,000,000, while State and local governments use the balance. A large portion of the Federal Budget is needed for the maintenance of the Military Establishment of the country and to pay for past wars. No doubt there are honest differences of opinion as to the wisdom of spending ever and ever larger sums for Army and Navy maintenance. It must be remembered, however, that the world is an armed camp, and jealousies and fears are lurking everywhere, and this condition impels the mad race for armaments and preparation for war. Let us hope that the people of the world ere long will regain their mental and spiritual balance and put an end to this insanity.

The Government is also charged with being wasteful and extravagant. Perhaps so. Waste and extravagance, however, are not peculiar to governments alone. There have been waste and extravagance in so-called private enterprise—the railroads, the power groups—in fact, nearly all public utilities have had their spree of waste and extravagance, all of which indicates that both governments and those engaged in quasi-governmental enterprises have not yet developed that civic mind and social conscience so essential for honest, efficient, and economical administration of government and public utilities. In the light of the moral delinquencies on the part of governments and public-utility companies, it is not only the right but the solemn duty of the people to demand at the hands of their governments and public-utility managers the correction of these delinquencies and shortcomings. Our tax bill is large, but much is being demanded of government these days. If the people expect an infinite variety of services from government, the cost necessarily must be correspondingly high, no matter how efficiently and economically administered.

THE PRODUCTIVE PROCESS ANALYZED

Since the high cost of government is disturbing the complacency and peace of mind of some of our worthy citizens, an honest and candid examination of the tax problem is in order. How often have we heard from the floor of this House the wail, "Where are you going to get the money?" This is a very proper and timely question. It is a very vital and important question, and upon its correct answer may turn the destiny of the American Republic. The problem of taxation is the most vital problem that can engage the attention of lawmakers and statesmen. For upon the sane and rational application of the incidence of taxation depend the peace, prosperity, and happiness of the people. The Supreme Court of the United States, in a celebrated case, said:

> The power to tax is the one power upon which the national fabric is based. It is not only the power to destroy, but also the power to keep alive.

This dictum of the Supreme Court is sound and attains its validity from the nature of the economy of the social structure. Since public revenues must be obtained from production and the taxing power may be used to destroy or to build, to kill or keep alive, it would seem that the first duty of the lawmaker and statesman is to reduce the productive process into its constitutent parts so that the incidence of taxation may be applied wisely and scientifically to the end that the artificial obstructions now hampering industry and impeding the free flow of trade may be removed. With this in mind, let us examine the conditions under which man lives and has his being.

We find man to be an inhabitant of the earth and beset by certain definite wants that must be gratified if life is to be maintained. The elements for the satisfaction of his wants must be drawn forth from the earth—the great storehouse from which the things are obtained that satisfy man's needs. The active factor in the process of drawing forth or producing the necessities of life on the part of the individual is labor. Another factor in the process of production is capital—tools employed by labor. Therefore there are three primary factors in the productive process: The earth—land in its comprehensive sense—and labor and capital. The product produced or drawn forth from the earth by labor and capital make up the infinite variety of things that gratify the physical wants and necessities of man and constitutes wealth in the true economic sense. This, then, is the simple picture of the productive process in which the great body of mankind is engaged in order to obtain their livelihood and maintain civilization.

Let us next examine how wealth, the product of production, is shared. Since the three primary factors in the process of production are land, labor, and capital, it is reasonable to assume that each factor is entitled to a share of the product; and, generally speaking, this is true, excepting in communities where land is free—that is, where land may be had for the taking, as in the settling and homesteading of our western frontier during the last century. The moment, however, that land becomes monopolized and free land can no longer be had for the asking, then those in control of the land demand a share of the wealth produced by labor and capital.

And let it be observed that the demands of the owners of monopolized land increase and multiply with the increase of population and the progress of the race. The higher the race advances in the scale of civilization—materially, intellectually, spiritually—the greater will be the exactions of those in control of the land. This is due to the fact that the benefits of human progress are absorbed by land. These benefits are reflected in the value of the land, thus enabling the landowners to appropriate from the products of labor and capital the equivalent of a fair return on the capitalized value of land. Therefore, those in control of monopolized land are in a position to appropriate all the wealth produced by labor and capital, excepting the portion needed to lure capital into productive enterprise and enable labor to live and reproduce. Landowners of monopolized land, as such, do not contribute anything whatsoever in productive effort. They are drones and parasites on industry. They reap where they have not sown and devour that which in justice and right reason belongs to all the people. Since the benefits of advancing civilization are absorbed by land, and the profits issuing therefrom appropriated by private interests rather than by society, it is obvious that private interests are enjoying what in justice ought to accrue to all. This fact must be taken into consideration in any serious study of the subject of taxation, for so long as we permit the few to appropriate what manifestly is the creation of all the people there can be no solution of the problem of unemployment and its companion problem, involuntary poverty. Nor can the ever perturbing problem of taxation, with its injustices, be solved.

ORIGIN—NATURE AND GROWTH OF LAND VALUE

There is a disposition on the part of lawmakers, statesmen, and economists to disregard the subject of land value and ignore the part it plays in our industrial economy. The manifestation of land value may be observed wherever people happen to establish a community. It appears in most striking form in the great centers of population, but the moment an effective demand arises for land by capital and labor exactions are demanded for the use of land, so that in village and hamlet, in agricultural sections, as well as in the great centers of population, land value appears. This social phenomenon is portrayed by Henry George, in Progress and Poverty, in these words:

Here, let us imagine, is an unbounded savannah, stretching off in unbroken sameness of grass and flower, tree and rill, till the traveler tires of the monotony. Along comes the wagon of the first immigrant. Where to settle he cannot tell—every acre seems as good as every other acre. As to wood, as to water, as to fertility, as to situation, there is absolutely no choice, and he is perplexed by the embarrassment of richness. Tired out with the search for one place that is better than another, he stops—somewhere, anywhere—and starts to make himself a home. The soil is virgin and rich; game is abundant; the streams flash with the finest trout. Nature is at her very best. He has what, were he in a populous district, would make him rich; but he is very poor. To say nothing of the mental craving, which would lead him to welcome the sorriest stranger, he labors under all the material disadvantages of solitude. He can get no temporary assistance for any work that requires a greater union of strength than that afforded by his own family, or by such help as he can permanently keep. Though he has cattle, he cannot often have fresh meat, for to get a beefsteak he must kill a bullock. He must be his own blacksmith, wagonmaker, carpenter, and cobbler—in short, a "jack of all trades and master of none." He cannot have his children schooled, for to do so he must himself pay and maintain a teacher. Such things as he cannot produce himself he must buy in quantities and keep on hand, or else go without, for he cannot be constantly leaving his work and making a long journey to the verge of civilization; and, when forced to do so, the getting of a vial of medicine or the replacement of a broken auger may cost him the labor of himself and horses for days. Under such circumstances, though Nature is prolific, the man is poor. It is an easy matter for him to get enough to eat; but, beyond this, his labor will suffice to satisfy only the simplest wants in the rudest way.

Soon there comes another immigrant. Although every quarter section of the boundless plain is as good as every other quarter section, he is not beset by any embarrassment as to where to settle. Though the land is the same, there is one place that is clearly better for him than any other place, and that is where there is already a settler, and he may have a neighbor. He settles by the side of the first comer, whose condition is at once greatly improved and to whom many things are now possible that were before impossible, for two men may help each other to do things that one man could never do.

Another immigrant comes, and, guided by the same attraction, settles where there are already two. Another, and another, until around our first comer there are a score of neighbors. Labor has now an effectiveness which, in the solitary state, it could not approach. If heavy work is to be done, the settlers have a log-rolling, and together they accomplish in a day what singly would require years. When one kills a bullock, the others take part of it, returning when they kill, and thus they have fresh meat all the time. Together they hire a schoolmaster, and the children of each are taught for a fractional part of what similar teaching would have cost the first settler. It becomes a comparatively easy matter to send to the nearest town, for someone is always going. But there is less need for such journeys. A blacksmith and a wheelwright soon set up shops, and our settler can have his tools repaired for a small part of the labor it formerly cost him. A store is opened and he can get what he wants as he wants it; a post office, soon added, gives him regular communication with the rest of the world. Then comes a cobbler, a carpenter, a harness-maker, a doctor; and a little church soon arises. Satisfactions become possible that in the solitary state were impossible. There are gratifications for the social and the intellectual nature, for that part of the man that rises above the animal. The power of sympathy, the sense of companionship, the emulation of comparison and contrast, open a wider and fuller and more varied life. In rejoicing, there are others to rejoice; in sorrow, the mourners do not mourn alone. There are husking bees and apple parings and quilting parties. Though the ballroom be unplastered and the orchestra but a fiddle, the notes of the magician are yet in the strain, and Cupid dances with the dancers. At the wedding there are others to admire and enjoy; in the house of death, there are watchers; by the open grave, stands human sympathy to sustain the mourners. Occasionally, comes a straggling lecturer to open up glimpses of the world of science, of literature, or of art; in election times come stump speakers, and the citizen rises to a sense of dignity and power as the cause of empires is tried before him in the struggle of John Doe and Richard Roe for his support and vote. And by and by comes the circus, talked of months before, and opening to children whose horizon has been the prairie, all the realms of the imagination—princes and princesses of fairy tale, mail-clad crusaders and turbaned Moors, Cinderella's fairy coach, and the giants of nursery lore; lions such as crouched before Daniel, or in circling Roman amphitheater tore the saints of God; ostriches who recall the sandy deserts; camels such as stood around when the wicked brethren raised Joseph from the well and sold him into bondage; elephants such as crossed the Alps with Hannibal, or felt the sword of Maccabees; and glorious music that thrills and builds in the chambers of the mind as rose the sunny dome of Kubla Khan.

Go to our settler now and say to him, "You have so many fruit trees which you planted, so much fencing, such a well, a barn, a house—in short, you have by your labor added so much value to this farm. Your land itself is not quite so good. You have been cropping it, and by and by it will need manure. I will give you the full value of all your improvements if you will give it to me and go again with your family beyond the verge of settlement." He would laugh at you. His land yields no more wheat or potatoes than before, but it does yield far more of all the necessaries and comforts of life. His labor upon it will bring no heavier crops, and, we will suppose, no more valuable crops, but it will bring far more of all the other things for which men work. The presence of other settlers—the increase of population—has added to the productiveness, in these things, of labor bestowed upon it, and this added productiveness gives it a superiority over land of equal natural quality where there are as yet no settlers. If no land remains to be taken up except such as is as far removed from population as was our settler's land when he first went upon it, the value or rent of this land will be measured by the whole of this added capability. If, however, as we have supposed, there is a continuous stretch of equal land over which population is now spreading, it will not be necessary for the new settler to go into the wilderness, as did the first. He will settle just beyond the other settlers and will get the advantage of proximity to them. The value or rent of our settler's land will thus depend on the advantage which it has, from being at the center of population, over that on the verge. In the one case the margin of production will remain as before, in the other the margin of production will be raised.

Population still continues to increase, and as it increases so do the economies which its increase permits, and which in effect add to the productiveness of the land. Our first settler's land, being the center of population, the store, the blacksmith's forge, the wheelwright's shop, are set upon it, or on its margin, where soon arises a village, which rapidly grows into a town, the center of exchanges for the people of the whole district. With no greater agricultural productiveness than it had at first, this land now begins to develop a productiveness of a higher kind. To labor expended in raising corn, or wheat, or potatoes, it will yield no more of those things than at first; but, to labor expended in the subdivided branches of production which require proximity to other producers, and, especially, to labor expended in that final part of production, which consists in distribution, it will yield much larger returns. The wheat grower may go further on, and find land on which his labor will produce as much wheat, and nearly as much wealth; but the artisan, the manufacturer, the storekeeper, the professional man, find that their labor expended here, at the center of exchanges, will yield them much more than if expended even at a little distance away from it; and this excess of productiveness for such purposes the landowner can claim just as he could an excess in its wheat-producing power. And so our settler is able to sell in building lots a few of his acres for prices which it would not bring for wheat growing if its fertility had been multiplied many times. With the proceeds he builds himself a fine house, and furnishes it handsomely. That is to say, to reduce the transaction to its lowest terms, the people who wish to use the land build and furnish the house for him, on condition that he will let them avail themselves of the superior productiveness which the increase of population has given the land.

Population still keeps on increasing, giving greater and greater utility to the land and more and more wealth to its owner. The town has grown into a city—a St. Louis, a Chicago, or a San Francisco—and still it grows. Production is here carried on upon a great scale, with the best machinery and the most favorable facilities; the division of labor becomes extremely minute, wonderfully multiplying efficiency; exchanges are of such volume and rapidity that they are made with the minimum of friction and loss. Here is the heart, the brain of the vast social organism that has grown up from the germ of the first settlement; here has developed one of the great ganglions of the human world. Hither run all roads, hither set all currents, through all the vast regions round about. Here, if you have anything to sell, is the market; here, if you have anything to buy, is the largest and choicest stock. Here intellectual activity is gathered into a focus, and here springs that stimulus which is born of the collision of mind with mind. Here are the great libraries, the storehouses and granaries of knowledge, the learned professors, the famous specialists. Here are museums and art galleries, collections of philosophical apparatus, and all things rare and valuable and best of their kind. Here come great actors and orators and singers from all over the world. Here, in short, is a center of human life, in all its varied manifestations.

So enormous are the advantages which this land now offers for the application of labor that, instead of one man with a span of horses scratching over acres, you may count in places thousands of workers to the acre, working tier on tier, on floors raised one above the other, five, six, seven, and eight stories from the ground, while underneath the surface of the earth engines are throbbing with pulsations that exert the force of thousands of horses.

All these advantages attach to the land; it is on this land and no other that they can be utilized, for here is the center of population—the focus of exchanges, the market place and workshop of the highest forms of industry. The productive powers which density of population has attached to this land are equivalent to the multiplication of its original fertility by the hundredfold and the thousandfold. And rent, which measures the difference between this added productiveness and that of the least productive land in use, has increased accordingly. Our settler, or whoever has succeeded to his right to the land, is now a millionaire. Like another Rip Van Winkle, he may have lain down and slept; still he is rich—not from anything he has done but from the increase in population. There are lots from which for every foot of frontage the owner may draw more than an average mechanic can earn; there are lots that will sell for more than would suffice to pave them with gold coin. In the principal streets are towering buildings of granite, marble, iron, and plate glass, finished in the most expensive style, replete with every convenience. Yet they are not worth as much as the land upon which they rest—the same land, in nothing changed, which when our first settler came upon it had no value at all.

Here, in poetic prose, is told the story of the nature, origin, and development of land value. The profit derived from capitalized land values is known in political economy as economic rent. J. Ramsay MacDonald, former Prime Minister of England, referring to this factor in the economic structure, said:

Rent (ground rent) is a toll, not a payment for services. By it social values are transferred from social pools into private pockets, and it becomes the means of vast economic exploitations. • • • Rent is obviously a common resource. Differences in fertility and value of site must be equalized by rent, but it ought to go to common funds and be spent in the common interest.

NATURAL FUND FOR PUBLIC REVENUE

"Where are you going to get the money?" has echoed and reechoed through this historic Chamber for many months. On more than one occasion the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] has made it the burden of his song. The problem of mounting debts and taxes in all conscience is serious and, as everyone knows, the burden of the cost of government—both Federal and local—is reaching proportions almost too grievous to be borne. But those who are alarmed at the extraordinary expenditures and disturbed at the refrain of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, let them explore for revenue purposes the possibilities of the fund represented by the Nation's land values and the values of the public-utility franchises; in other words, the ground rent to which J. Ramsay MacDonald refers.

An honest, impartial, intelligent investigation will disclose the fact that the land values of America and the public-utility franchise values constitute a fund provided by Nature and Nature's God that will supply not only the means of every legitimate public expense but will meet every canon of sound taxation. Yea, it will do more. It will go far to solve the problem of unemployment and involuntary poverty. It will lay the basis and point the way for the honest and equitable distribution of wealth. It will give light and leading to the baffled and perplexed educators, statesmen, and philosophers that are grappling with these problems.

The question is frequently asked: "Why so much want in the midst of plenty?" President Roosevelt, in his Atlanta speech, put the same question in this form:

I think it is of interest to point out that national surveys prove that the average of our citizenship lives today on what would be called by the medical fraternity "a third-class diet." If the country lived on a second-class diet, we would need to put many more acres than we use today back into the production of foodstuffs for domestic consumption. If the Nation lived on a first-class diet, we would have to put more acres than we have ever cultivated into the production of an additional supply of things for Americans to eat.

Why, speaking in broad terms in following up this particular illustration, are we living on a third-class diet?

And proceeds to answer by saying:

For the very simple reason that the masses of the American people have not got the purchasing power to eat more and better food.

And the President properly might have pursued the question further and included not only better food but better clothes, better housing, not to say anything about modern conveniences.

LACK OF PURCHASING POWER

Why do the people lack purchasing power? It is not due to the people's unwillingness to labor and produce wealth. It is not due to lack of capital nor to the niggardliness of nature. All about us we see natural resources that willing hands and idle tools are anxious to exploit. The natural resources of the Nation, if touched by the magic hand of labor and capital, would supply enough and to spare for all.

The Bureau of Home Economics of the Agricultural Department, after a careful survey of the needs of an average family in the United States, found that an annual income of $2,500 was necessary to maintain a reasonable standard of living. When it is remembered that in 1929, the year of our peak prosperity, there were 6,000,000 families in the United States with incomes of less than $1,000, 12,000,000 families with incomes under $1,500, and over 19,000,000 families—over 71 percent of our entire population—with incomes less than $2,500, it is obvious that the wants of the people were far from satisfied. In periods of depression and in times of ordinary business conditions, the income of the average family is considerably less. These facts indicate the inadequate and limited purchasing power of the great mass of the people either in so-called good or bad times. They further indicate that there is among our own people a great potential market that will be available with the advent of adequate purchasing power in the hands of the masses. It is estimated that if the income of the average family were $2,500 per annum, the farms, mills, and factories would be required to produce 75 percent more wealth or consumers' goods in order to supply the demand of the American market.

These facts confirm the findings of the Brookings Institution, of Washington, D. C., which found, after an exhaustive investigation and study of the problem of production and distribution of wealth, that at the very peak of our so-called prosperity, in 1929, 13 percent of the people of the United States owned 90 percent of the wealth and that the income of the other 87 percent was so low that only a few of them consumed any luxuries or conveniences at all, and that practically all of the 87 percent were compelled to spend their entire income for the bare necessities of life, and further discovered that if the income of the other 87 percent were sufficient to enable them to maintain a standard of living such as the Bureau of Home Economics of the Agricultural Department describes as reasonable, there would be a marked increase in production and consumption.

In our exploration for an answer to the question of "Why want in the midst of plenty?" and to President Roosevelt's observations about inferior diet and lack of purchasing power, and the Brookings Institution's discovery of the inequitable distribution of wealth and the low purchasing power of 71 percent of the American people, we may, perchance, also discover the Eldorado where the money may be had with which to pay the tax bills.

Recalling Henry George's story of the nature, origin, and growth of land values, let us, for example, take the city of New York. The report of the commissioner of taxes and assessments for the year 1934 discloses the fact that the land values of the city of New York are $8,000,995,996, while the improvement values total $8,456,173,777. It will be observed that the value of the land and the value of the improvements are about equal. And here let it be noted that rows upon rows of buildings and skyscrapers in the city of New York represent a tremendous amount of human labor—every building, every home, every office, every factory, every skyscraper came into being only as the result of the labor of thousands upon thousands of workmen. Not so with the value of the land. The increment of land value is not a labor product. It is the result of the people as a whole functioning as society—as a social organism. The origin of the value of improvements and the value of land are totally different. One is a labor value, the other a social value. The former is the result of productive effort, the latter the growth and progress of society.

What is true of the city of New York is true of every community, large or small. The land values and public-utility franchise values of the Nation in normal times are estimated at $200,000,000,000. The value of the Nation's permanent labor products in normal times is approximately two hundred billions. And inasmuch as the one is the product of society and the other the product of labor, are we not within the bounds of logic, good morals, and sound law in concluding that labor ought to receive the share it produces and society be rewarded for the share it produces? Why are the products of labor so illy shared? Why is wealth so inequitably distributed?

Lincoln, in discussing this problem, said:

> Inasmuch as most good things are produced by labor, it follows that all such things belong to those whose labor has produced them. But—> it has happened in all ages of the world that some have labored and others, without labor, have enjoyed a large proportion of the fruits.

Applying this line of reasoning to the problem in hand, who is the rightful owner of the profits issuing out of the land values not only of the city of New York but of the land values and public-utility franchise values of the Nation? Manifestly they belong to the people. But under present law and custom we permit a few to appropriate to their own use that which obviously belongs to all. And so Lincoln's observation is still true—that there are some who, without labor, enjoy a large proportion of the fruits of labor. It is this fact which explains President Roosevelt's and the Brookings Institution's observation about the lack of purchasing power of the great mass of mankind and furnishes an answer to the disquieting question, Why want in the midst of plenty?

WHY POLITICS AND GOVERNMENT ARE CORRUPT

It explains even more. It is this fact in our economic society that accounts for much of the vulgarity and corruption in government and politics. Albert Jay Nock, a publicist and fundamental thinker of note, puts the case in this fashion. He says:

> So long as the State stands as an impersonal mechanism which can confer an economic advantage at the mere touch of a button, men will seek by all sorts of ways to get at the button, because law-made property is acquired with less exertion than labor-made property. It is easier to push the button and get some State-created monopoly, like a land title, a tariff, a franchise, or other governmental concessions, and pocket the proceeds than to accumulate the same amount by labor.

Man seeks to gratify his desires and wants with the least possible exertion. There are only two ways by which these wants and desires can be gratified—one is by labor or rendering service, the other by stealing or extorting service. It is, of course, plain why men seek to get at the button to which Nock directs our attention. But it is also clear that we cannot exist as a people or a Nation by robbing each other, whether by the ordinary highway method of stand and deliver or the more refined way of using the power of government.

Since wealth is brought into existence by human labor alone, it follows that some must labor and produce the things that man needs for the gratification of his wants and desires, and therefore it would seem that, since all cannot hope to derive their living off the labor of others, that we put an end to the stealing of the few by organizing society in such fashion that none would reap where others have sown. It is obvious if we wish to establish an economic order based upon the foundation of social justice that the burden of taxation now resting upon the products of industry and labor must be removed and the profits that issue from governmental concessions, such as land titles, franchises, and the like, must be used for public purposes so that all the people will enjoy their share of the community fund. Incidentally, this would put an end to the great prizes for which many of our foremost citizens are ready and eager to grovel in the dirt and slime of politics in order to get at the governmental button. If the problem of unemployment is to be solved and involuntary poverty abolished, then government must be administered in such fashion that legal privilege of whatsoever nature will be destroyed. In other words, the economic advantages derived from pushing the governmental button must be removed from the realm of government and politics.

NATURAL LAWS VS. ARTIFICIAL LEGISLATION

This can be accomplished by the simple process of noninterference with the natural growth and development of human society and the sane and rational use of the taxing power. Too many well-meaning and kindly disposed persons are unmindful of the fact that the operation of natural law in the field of economics can be trusted to bring about just, equitable, and beneficial results, while artificial legislation is bound to go astray. President Roosevelt has declared that we today are engaged in a great crusade in every part of the land to cooperate with Nature and not to fight her. This is fine. But in our effort to cooperate with Nature let us make certain that we are in very truth cooperating with her and not running counter to her all-wise and beneficent laws.

The great Italian economist of the eighteenth century, Gaetano Filangieri, in his Science of Legislation, said:

> There are certain natural laws governing our economic life. If we regulated our lives according to these natural laws, we would abolish poverty and secure justice and prosperity for all.

Another eminent economist, also of the eighteenth century, said:

> There is in human affairs one order which is the best. It is not always the order which exists, but it is the order which ought to exist for the greatest good of humanity. God knows it and wills it. Man's duty is to discover and establish it.

Patrick Edward Dove, a profound economist of the nineteenth century, in The Theory of Human Progression, demonstrates the same truth, while Henry George, in his monumental work, Progress and Poverty, in analyzing and developing his social philosophy, demonstrates logically, scientifically, and conclusively the truth declared by these eminent economists. If we are going to cooperate with Nature, we must learn her laws and obey her commands.

Blackstone, the great English commentator, said:

> God has graciously reduced the rule of obedience to this one paternal precept "that man should pursue his own true and substantial happiness." That this precept is the foundation of what we call ethics or natural law and that no human laws are of any validity if contrary to this, and all of them that are valid derive all their force and all their authority from this origin.

Since the validity of all human law derives all its force and authority from the moral or natural laws, any human enactments in relation to the problem of taxation must likewise derive their validity from the same source.

MORALS AND SOUND TAXATION

One of the most important natural laws that govern our economic life is the law of economic rent. Therefore let us put the proposal of taking the economic rent of land or the profits issuing from land value for public use to the test of the inexorable rule of Nature. And first let it be observed how beautifully and wisely Nature has provided for the needs of a growing and advancing community. Someone has said:

That Nature has intended the state to obtain the revenues it needs by the taxation of land values is shown by the same order and degree of evidence that shows that God has intended the milk of the mother for the nourishment of the babe. For no sooner does the state arise, it needs revenues. This need for revenue increases with the increase of population and the development of human society. The increasing need for public revenues with social advance, being a natural need, there must be a right way of raising them. It is clear that this right way must accord with the moral or natural law.

Let us consider the taxes on the processes and products of industry by which our present public revenues are collected. The taxes on occupations, on earnings, on investments, on buildings, on houses, on the cultivation of fields, on industry and thrift in all forms have none of the characteristics indispensable in any plan we can deem a right one. All these taxes violate the moral law. For they take by force what belongs to the individual; they give to the unscrupulous an advantage over the scrupulous; they corrupt government; they make oaths a mockery; they shackle commerce; they fine industry and thrift; they lessen the wealth that man might enjoy, and enrich some by impoverishing others.

Now, what about the tax on land values? We have observed that land values are the result of community growth and advancing civilization. They do not come into being as a result of the activity of any particular individual, but by the activity of all the people functioning as a social organism. Therefore, since no particular individual is responsible for the origin and growth of land values, but are due to the activity of all the people, it is clear that the profits issuing from land values belong to all the people. Well has it been said that:

Nature gives to labor, and to labor alone. In a very Garden of Eden a man would starve but for human exertion. Now, here are two men of equal incomes—that of the one derived from the exertion of his labor, that of the other from the rent of land. Is it just that they should equally contribute to the expenses of the State? Evidently not. The income of the one represents wealth he creates and adds to the general wealth of the State; the income of the other represents merely wealth that he takes from the general stock, returning nothing. The right of the one to the enjoyment of his income rests on the warrant of Nature, which returns wealth to labor; the right of the other to the enjoyment of his income is a mere fictitious right, the creation of municipal regulation, which is unknown and unrecognized by Nature.

And also let it be further observed that a tax upon land values is the most just of all taxes, for—

It falls only upon those who receive from society a peculiar and valuable benefit, and upon them in proportion to the benefit they receive. It is the taking by the community, for the use of the community, of that value which is the creation of the community. It is the application of the common property to common uses. When all rent is taken by taxation for the needs of the community, then will the equality ordained by Nature be attained. No citizen will have an advantage over any other citizen save as is given by his industry, skill, and intelligence; and each will obtain what he fairly earns. Then, but not till then, will labor get its full reward, and capital its natural return.

This is a consummation devoutly to be wished. But inasmuch as public opinion has not yet been developed sufficiently to recognize the inequity of the present tax system nor the justice of the taxation of land values, it is obvious that the present need is education and more education, to the end that a healthy and wholesome public opinion may be developed on the vital question of taxation. In order that such education may not be misguided and destructive of its own ends, the promulgation of ideas in relation to taxation and the subject of political economy contrary to the social order ordained by Nature and Nature's God is charged with TNT of bad economics and in the very nature of things will be destructive of the very society and civilization for which the friends of social justice live and labor and sacrifice. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ECKERT] has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOK].

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I have heard several speakers this afternoon on the subject of taxation raise the question of how this money has been spent by our Democratic Party. I may say that it has been appropriated in behalf of the people of this Nation, and President Roosevelt demands that it be spent honestly and impartially in behalf of all the people of this great Nation who are in need.

Let me preface my remarks by saying that in the State of Michigan and in many States of the United States since November 1935, no Federal relief grants have been given to Michigan and other States by the Federal Government; so that all direct relief money spent in the States is completely controlled by the State administration. In the State of Michigan we have a Republican administration.

I want to read this letter to you to show what a Republican administration is doing with relief money:

IRON RIVER, MICH., April 14, 1936.

FRANK E. HOOK.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you, telling I have been 3 months without any wood. I have been after them dozens and dozens of times, and one cold day I went to the Caspian office, walked 4 miles. When I got in there Mr. Brotherington was sitting in a big soft morris chair in front of a nice big fireplace, smoking a big cigar, and had refused to talk to me and I was half froze and turned away.

I left word there for the investigator to make a call at my home. She came about 2 weeks after. The day she came I was gone to see the doctor. My husband was at home. This is what she told my husband. "If you take that picture (meaning President Roosevelt) down from the wall, maybe we could get somewhere." We didn't think anything of this right then. We thought we would get the wood but we didn't, so then I went up to the food store where they have their offices on Tuesday, April 14, and seen the investigator, Miss Doring, and asked her about the wood, and she came out with the same thing, only a little stronger. She said, if you take the picture off your wall, then Mr. Brotherington would give you some wood. She said Mr. Roosevelt doesn't help you anyway.

I'll sign an affidavit in front of anyone that this is nothing but the truth. We were treated fine until the picture came up, until the first investigator came in our house and seen it. I told her I would never take that picture down from my wall, and I didn't get any wood yet. I will take this matter up anywhere with you.

Very truly yours,

(Signed) MRS. ALPHONSE BEZOTTE,
932 W. Mickler Street, Iron River, Mich.

P. S.: I wrote to you before. My husband is sick and under the doctor's care, and we need help. Please answer.

Talk about buying votes! When Members on the opposite side of this aisle accuse the Democratic Party of trying to buy votes with relief money, how do they explain away such a situation as that outlined in this letter, a situation absolutely and positively under the control of the Republican administration? What would happen if the Republican Party were in control nationally?

The previous two Republican speakers referred to the agricultural program and other agencies of the Government in a critical manner. Let me refer to an achievement in which I have much pride, that of the Michigan farmers since 1932. The farmers of my State during this panic year were paying the highest taxes on agricultural land and farm real estate of any State in the Union. They were crushed between the millstones of the depression and were unable to help themselves until the Federal program of 1933 was launched which reduced the taxes on rural farms some 60 percent in the State of Michigan.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOOK. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman tell the House whether or not the reduction in farm taxes was brought about by constitutional amendment, by vote of the people of the State, or by the legislature?

Mr. HOOK. It was brought about through the fact that Michigan itself could not have operated in behalf of and for the good of the farmers without being helped by the National Government.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HOOK. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman has not answered my question. I will say, if he dislikes to answer, that the reduction in the tax on real estate in the State of Michigan was brought about by a constitutional amendment voted by the people of the State. It was brought about by the people themselves. That is the fact.

Mr. HOOK. Partially so. I grant that the Democratic administration was responsible for that, but the greatest benefits were brought about through the agricultural program. But there are things in connection with the spending of the taxpayers' money in the extension work in that great State to which I want to call attention.

It is inherent in the hearts of Americans to take pride in the performance and progress of each one of the individual States that make up the Union. Citizens of a particularly fortunate State are, of course, doubly proud, and as a citizen of Michigan it is with great gratification that I point to the progress that my State has achieved in two major fields of enterprise, upon which the citizens of Michigan depend for their livelihood, since the depth of the depression in 1932, to the present time.

First, I wish to call attention to the record of the automobile industry during the past 4 years. The production of automobiles has increased by more than 70 percent. New plants are being built in many Michigan manufacturing cities. Many leading automobile factories are behind in their orders for new cars. These cars are sold throughout the United States and exported to foreign countries. In a sense, more than three-fourths of the people of the United States travel with their feet on a part of Michigan, since the floors of 90 percent of their cars and the chassis beneath are made in Michigan factories, largely from iron and timber produced in Michigan.

I am proud of the leadership Michigan has taken among other States in rising out of the depression through this major industrial development, but as a citizen of Michigan I realize fully that Michigan alone as a State was prostrate and helpless 4 years ago when her factories and mines were closed, and her people out of work, and orders for automobiles had dwindled to less than one-fourth of the normal business.

Early in 1933 the program of the Federal Government was launched and a recovery started that began at the grass roots, primarily through the cooperation of farmers in the program authorized by the Agricultural Adjustment Act, that increased the purchasing power of farmers of the United States by 40 percent in 1934 and over 60 percent in 1935, as compared to the panic year of 1932. Statistics show that it was the farmers and the businessmen dealing with farmers who were the largest purchasers of the automobiles made in Detroit factories.

A second great achievement in which I take particular pride is the achievement of Michigan farmers since 1932. The farmers of my State during this panic year were paying the highest taxes on agricultural land and farm real estate of any State in the Union. They were crushed between the millstones of the depression and were unable to help themselves until the Federal program of 1933 was launched, and through the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, the Farm Credit Administration, and other New Deal agencies, farm foreclosures dwindled and prices on basic commodity crops were advanced toward parity prices.

Ordinarily the reports of crop statisticians are considered dry and musty, but the crop report for the State of Michigan of January 1936, issued by the State department of agriculture, with the United States Department of Agriculture cooperating, reads like a romance to those who look back to the dark and desperate days of 1932 and at the same time vision the progress that has taken place since as represented by cold figures—figures that show less of misery and more of happiness, less of despair and more of hope, for farm families. This report states that in 1932 the total value of livestock and crop production for the State of Michigan was $118,567,000.

In 1935 the total cash farm income for Michigan had risen to $177,000,000 for all crops and livestock, an increase of nearly 50 percent. In addition, this report further states that taxes on farm real estate had declined approximately 60 percent from 1929 to 1934, 1935 taxes being not yet available. The report of the State statistician indicates that progress toward complete recovery will continue in 1936. Practically all farms of the State are in full operation, and many new farms, particularly the small farms of part-time farmers who work in industry part of their time have been brought into production.

One of the outstanding achievements in Michigan has been in the increase of alfalfa acreage, in which Michigan now ranks second in the Union, an increase of from 74,000 acres in 1919 to nearly 1,000,000 acres in 1935; and in sugar beets, in which she ranks third, increasing from an acreage of 58,000 in 1931 to 115,000 acres in 1935; and field beans, in which Michigan ranks first, producing a crop valued at $5,363,000 in 1931 and worth nearly $10,000,000 in 1935 ($9,852,000). In potatoes, Michigan took second rank of the Nation in 1935, with a crop valued at $12,492,000; while in 1931, when the depression was on, the potato crop of Michiganders was worth only $4,331,000. Michiganders are also proud of the fact that Michigan ranks first as a cherry State, her crop being worth $1,622,000 in 1935; while in 1932, the lowest point of the panic years, Michigan's cherry crop brought a return of only $608,000.

Neither do we Wolverines cry over the fact that we are the first onion State of the Union, and we do not mind if you poke fun at us for being the premier pickle-producing State. And these products, too, have gained as the consuming public with increased purchasing power has had more money with which to buy pickles and cherries.

It is not only through the direct basic-commodity crop acreage-control program of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration that Michigan farmers benefited but through the wise purchases of surpluses by the commodity-purchase section of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration that prices on dairy products, beans, and special crops were maintained.

The leading authority of the cooperative organizations of Michigan and also of the bean-jobbing industry states that orderly marketing resulting from the Federal purchase of pea beans in 1935 saved Michigan farmers from enormous losses that would have been caused by gluts of the market. These losses would have run into millions of dollars without this wise aid from the Federal program in handling one of Michigan's largest bean crops.

The new Federal soil-conservation program is now being launched in Michigan, and those who understand its provisions and who have been in touch with the soil-conservation program of the past 10 years of the Michigan Agricultural College realize that this program offers much to Michigan. It grieves me, however, to note that political pressures are still brought to bear upon that grand old institution, the mother of all agricultural colleges, in an effort to break down the wise provisions of the New Deal for agriculture and for the general welfare of the Nation. In that connection I wish to remonstrate here against any political control being exerted that perverts the Federal- and State-supported land-grant colleges of America from their high purpose. They are unique in their service to the Nation and deserve complete freedom from self-seeking political influences. Their economists need not be hired by any political group to give facts. These institutions stand ready to give the facts freely to the Nation as part of their service.

Some years ago certain members of a political group got mixed up in affairs that looked surprisingly like grand larceny, perjury, and unethical and illegal use of State funds at our land-grant college.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein a report of the Senate committee investigating the administration of the affairs of the Michigan State College of Agriculture and Applied Sciences.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, is it a State or Federal document the gentleman speaks of?

Mr. HOOK. This is a State document involving some Federal funds, namely, funds of the War Department in the R. O. T. C.

Mr. TREADWAY. Does the gentleman believe them applicable to a tax bill?

Mr. HOOK. They relate to tax money that is being spent.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I shall not object.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

REPORT OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE INVESTIGATING THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE AFFAIRS OF THE MICHIGAN STATE COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE AND APPLIED SCIENCE

His Excellency the Governor and honorable members of the Senate, of the State of Michigan.

GENTLEMEN: On February 28, 1933, the Senate passed the following resolution known as Senate Resolution No. 27:

"Senate Resolution No. 27

"A resolution providing for a public investigation into the administration of the affairs of the Michigan State College of Agriculture and Applied Science, together with the affairs of its officials and employees and the activities of any person, corporation, or other body, directly or indirectly related to said Michigan State College of Agriculture and Applied Science.

"Whereas certain facts have appeared and certain rumors have been circulated regarding the administration of the affairs of the Michigan State College of Agriculture and Applied Science, tending to call into question the propriety of the acts and policy of the administration of the affairs of the Michigan State College of Agriculture and Applied Science; and

"Whereas the Michigan State College of Agriculture and Applied Science is a public institution supported by public taxes appropriated in large part for the purposes of said institution by this legislature; and

"Whereas certain of the moneys expended by this institution are specific appropriations for the expenditure of which the legislature should rightfully inquire into, in case of doubt; and

"Whereas notwithstanding the breadth of the powers which may have been conferred upon said institution with regard to the expenditure of moneys generally appropriated to its use by this legislature, it is the duty of this legislature, in view of the fact it must continue to make such general appropriations, to satisfy itself as to the wisdom and public policy of the appropriations so made to said institution; and

"Whereas certain employees of this institution have been discharged in the middle of the school year and their salary continued without satisfactory explanation of this unusual conduct by the officers of said institution; and

"Whereas the affairs of this institution have been determined upon behind closed doors, and all previous official investigations of these affairs have also been closed to the public, the taxpayers of this State have a right to be enlightened with regard to these matters by means of a public investigation; and

"Whereas the officers of the college are entitled to a fair and impartial investigation of their acts and statements concerning them; and

"Whereas the citizens, farmers, and taxpayers of this State are interested in the agricultural activities carried on by the college and other corporations, boards, and persons in this State: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the senate, That a committee of five be appointed by the Lieutenant Governor and be authorized to conduct, with the aid of the attorney general or his assistant, a public investigation of the administration of the affairs of the Michigan State College of Agriculture and Applied Science, together with the affairs of its officials and employees and the activities of any person, corporation, or other body directly or indirectly related to said Michigan State College of Agriculture and Applied Science, the activities carried on by the college and other corporations, persons, or other bodies in this State, such committee to report their findings to the Governor and the legislature within 90 days; and be it further

"Resolved, That such committee be authorized to administer oaths, to subpena witnesses, and examine the books and records of any persons, partnerships, corporations, or any body, commission, department, or institution of the State; and be it further

"Resolved, That such committee shall be authorized to incur such expenses and employ, with the exception of legal aid or counsel, such expert and other assistance as may be necessary, and that the members of the committee shall serve without compensation, such expenses to be payable from appropriations to be designated therefor upon a proper voucher signed by the chairman after approval by the committee."

Acting under the above resolution, the committee appointed ordered an audit of the records of the Michigan State College of Agriculture and Applied Science, and other organizations related to it, and has held public hearings and examined witnesses from day to day.

The results of the investigation by the committee are set forth in the following paragraphs:

1. The committee determined that there was a cash shortage of $8,087.65 in the uniform deposit and advance military account as carried on the books of the treasurer of the college at June 30, 1932; that this shortage had accumulated over a period of years; that officials of the college and members of the State board of agriculture knew that this shortage existed at the time a grand jury investigated the affairs of the college in 1932; that the report of the grand jury indicates that the evidence given before it was incorrect and misleading, inasmuch as the grand jury's report states that the shortage was $400; that the State board of agriculture appropriated $8,087.65 to make good the shortage without determining the person or persons responsible for same.

2. The organization of the treasurer's office for the handling and control of cash is defective, and the records show that there are frequent discrepancies between the cash on hand as shown by the records and the actual cash on hand.

This condition has been brought to the attention of the officials of the college and the State board of agriculture in a previous audit, and they have refrained from or delayed in taking the necessary steps to correct the condition.

3. The treasurer's records show several transactions covering cash received and disbursed over a period of years and the transactions referred to have never appeared in the annual financial reports of the college. For example, a loan of $1,260 made to the Union Opera Board on December 19, 1922, appears on the treasurer's books. Interest collected on bank deposits since the year 1916 totaling $15,486.34 is also recorded on the treasurer's books. Neither of these items have appeared in the annual financial statements of the college, and the financial statements as published have been incorrect.

4. The control of cash received from commercial sales, services, and other operations in many of the departments of the college is inadequate. In many of these transactions credit is extended and there is no control of the transactions. No entry is made for them on the general books of the college until and unless cash is received. The committee's investigation disclosed that there was in excess of $25,000 of accounts receivable owing to the college, which did not appear on the general books, and that many of these accounts were long past due and in some instances actually bad.

5. The officials of the college and the State board of agriculture were grossly negligent in arranging for and supervising depositary bonds protecting the funds of the college on deposit in banks.

The college had $76,041.22 tied up in the East Lansing State Bank, East Lansing, Mich., on March 31, 1933. This deposit was supposed to have been protected through an agreement with the bank to deposit securities with the Grand Rapids Trust Co. The agreement reads in part, as follows:

"The bank hereby agrees to deposit securities in the amount computed at their market value of at least 10 percent more than the amount deposited by said depositor."

The amount of securities actually deposited with the Grand Rapids Trust Co. under the agreement, even when the securities are considered at par value was only $49,700, which was $33,945.34 less than the requirement under the agreement, and $19,500 of the securities deposited are in default.

The treasurer of the college is president of this bank.

The secretary of the college was a director of this bank until recently.

A member of the college faculty is vice president and two members of the faculty are directors of this bank.

The college had $185,935.39 tied up in the Capital National Bank, Lansing, Mich., on March 31, 1933. A surety bond executed by the Guardian Detroit Union Group, Inc., was accepted by the State board of agriculture to secure the deposit. In this case the State board of agriculture accepted a surety bond, without collateral, rrom the company which owned the bank in which the deposit was made.

The gross negligence on the part of officials of the college and State board of agriculture will result in a considerable loss of public funds.

6. The inventory of supplies carried by the college amounts to approximately $40,000. This inventory is controlled and purchases are regulated by a perpetual inventory system which has been installed. The inventory contains approximately 4,200 items. A physical inventory made of 192 items in stores, disclosed that only slightly over 51 percent of the items were correct; that over 29 percent of the items were short, and over 18 percent of the items were over, when compared with the perpetual inventory.

An examination of 482 items, picked at random, carried in the perpetual inventory shows that purchases have been made in excess of the requirements of the college, and that over 31 percent of the items examined had not been called for or used since 1931, and many of the items referred to had not been used at the college for years prior to 1931.

The following examples of overpurchase of supplies are given:

On August 24, 1929, the college purchased 2,500 feet of lead-covered cable at a cost of $509.67. At March 31, 1933, about 200 feet of cable had been used, and the balance was on hand. Inquiry disclosed that the cable was not of a type which was regularly used at the college.

On April 20, 1931, 500 bags of calcium chloride were purchased at a cost of $633.75. On July 30, 1931, about 3 months later, a further supply of 500 bags was purchased at a cost of $633.75. From the date of the first purchase to the end of the year in which both purchases were made only 470 bags were used. The purchase in that year was upward of 500 bags in excess of the requirement. In 1932 only 46 bags were used. On that basis the college has a 10-year supply on hand.

On November 13, 1931, 12 Yale locks and 24 master keys were purchased, at a cost of $64.30. The locks and keys were still in stores on April 26, 1933.

The committee has information regarding a number of items of the same type as those above quoted.

The college has frozen a considerable amount of its working funds in unusable supplies through careless purchasing practices.

7. The college has carried an average balance in its creamery operating fund ranging from $5,000 to $46,000 on deposit in the East Lansing State Bank, East Lansing, Mich., from 1925 to 1932.

No interest has ever been received on this deposit.

The report of the special assistant attorney general who held an investigation at the college in 1932 stated that the interest on this deposit had been adjusted. The statement was incorrect.

8. The disbursement of an appropriation of $50,000 for improvement of grounds authorized by the State legislature in act 402 of the Public Acts of 1927 was made under the supervision of T. Glenn Phillips, the college landscape architect. Mr. Phillips was on the college staff at a yearly salary of $1,500. The records show that $10,818.49 was disbursed to Mr. Phillips' staff. The majority of the checks drawn in favor of Mr. Phillips' staff were endorsed by the individuals and then endorsed for deposit in Mr. Phillips' bank account.

9. The college has on its staff a building architect at a salary of $1,500. The firm of which the architect is a member has obtained practically all of the work in connection with the preparation of plans and specifications for college buildings constructed and has been paid 5 percent of the cost of construction for its services.

10. A private dormitory known as "Mary Mayo Hall" was built on the college campus in 1930 from funds obtained from the sale of securities by the First Detroit Co.

The amount of securities sold was $425,000.

The advertising matter used in the sale of these securities described the issue as "Michigan State College 6-percent Dormitory Trust Certificates." The college does not own the dormitory and, according to the agreements examined, it is not financially obligated in connection with the retirement of the securities at maturity.

The securities are in default.

The securities were issued and the advertising matter used with the full knowledge of the officials of the college and the State board of agriculture.

The issue of the securities and the advertising matter used in their sale was approved by the Michigan Securities Commission.

The college has leased Mary Mayo Hall and has contracted to pay from the net income of the dormitory if the earnings are sufficient, a stipulated amount to take care of the dividends on the securities issued and to retire the securities as they mature.

The lease contains the following clause:

"The lessee shall not operate another dormitory or dining hall which will impair the income of this dormitory from rooms and board to such an extent as, in the judgment of the lessor, will endanger the collection of sufficient revenue for the payment of the rent reserved herein. If at any time the lessor shall give to the lessee notice in writing that it is necessary for the protection of such revenue to discontinue the operation of any other dormitory or dining hall by the lessee, the lessee shall discontinue such operation as soon as practicable and, in any event, within 1 year after such notice."

Under the above-cited clause, the trustee for Mary Mayo Hall can order the closing of dormitories and dining halls owned and operated by the college, if the net income of Mary Mayo Hall is not sufficient to meet the dividends on securities issued and to retire securities as they mature.

11. In October 1930 the State board of agriculture authorized the purchase of 36 shares in the Michigan State College of Agriculture and Applied Science Dormitory Trust No. 1 (Mary Mayo Hall) at a cost of $35,910. The purchase was made from college funds. The securities mature in blocks of $6,000 every 4 years from 1936 to 1950.

This was an improper investment of public funds which were appropriated by the State Legislature for current operating expenses.

12. The State board of agriculture appropriated and disbursed $32,362.20 for the construction of a service tunnel to Mary Mayo Hall, a dormitory on the college campus, which is owned by a private trust for which the Detroit Trust Co. acts as trustee. This amount was not refunded to the college from the proceeds of the securities sold to finance the construction of the dormitory and no arrangement has been made regarding the refunding of the amount.

13. The college furnishes electricity, steam, water, gas, and telephone service to Mary Mayo Hall, a privately owned dormitory on the college campus, at a flat rate of $4,500 per annum. The base rates on which this charge is computed by the college are incorrect, inasmuch as they do not include any charge for depreciation on buildings, plant, and equipment, or transmission and distribution lines.

14. The State legislature appropriated $300,000 to the college for building purposes for use in the year 1931. Of this amount $100,000 was used to pay a portion of the debt owed by the college to the State in connection with the construction of the football stadium at the campus.

The State board of agriculture has appropriated from the balance of the above appropriation a sum of $150,000 to be used along with other funds, to be raised by the sale of securities, for the construction of another dormitory along the same lines as the Mary Mayo Hall, previously mentioned in this report.

It is evident that the $300,000 building appropriation made by the State legislature for use in the year 1931 was not required for general college buildings.

The State board of agriculture on October 31, 1931, entered into a preliminary agreement with the Detroit Trust Co. and The First Detroit Co., in connection with the leasing of the ground and the building and the financing of the construction of the dormitory mentioned above. It also entered into an agreement with Malcolmson, Higginbotham & Trout, architects, Detroit, Mich., for the preparation of plans and specifications, and plans and specifications have been prepared. A payment of $4,500 has been made by the college on the plans and specifications, and it is obligated for a further payment to the architects of $4,600 payable over a period of 5 years. Construction of the dormitory has not started.

The amount paid by the college is refundable when construction is started and the securities have been sold.

15. From June 1925 to June 30, 1928, the college furnished the Union Building on the campus, which is privately owned, with electric, steam, and water service amount to $13,190.37, without charge. In the year ended June 30, 1929, it furnished the same service in the amount of $11,266.28 without charge. In each subsequent year to date, it has appropriated to the building free service to the extent of $10,500.

The total free service furnished and appropriated was approximately $66,450.

16. In 1929 the State board of agriculture appropriated and disbursed $8,215.21 for finishing a portion of the privately owned Union Building on the campus for use as a faculty club.

17. The State of Michigan carries in its sinking funds $300,000 of bonds on the privately owned Union Building on the campus. Two hundred and eighteen thousand dollars of these bonds have matured and are unpaid and $96,725 of interest on the bonds is past due.

18. The State board of agriculture donated in cash to the Michigan State College Alumni Association $86,634.81 from 1918 to 1933.

19. From October 1930 to December 1932, the State board of agriculture has appropriated and disbursed $380.21 in payments of the traveling expenses of the secretary of Michigan State College Alumni Association attending alumni meetings.

20. In 1931 there was appropriated and disbursed from general college funds $1,594.78 to pay a note to the Capital National Bank, Lansing, Mich., which had been guaranteed by 24 endorsers in connection with sending of the college band to Washington, D. C., to attend a football game. Prior to the band leaving for Washington, the board had refused to make any appropriation for the trip.

21. The State board of agriculture authorized the payment of the traveling expenses of the secretary of the college, H. H. Halladay, in the amount of $58.78, and of professor of music, Lewis Richards, in the amount of $63.04, attending the above-mentioned football game at Washington, D. C.

22. An attempt was made by the secretary of the college, H. H. Halladay, to sell a horse to the college. The price of $150 was agreed upon between Mr. Halladay and R. S. Hudson, head of the farm and horse department. A requisition was issued by Mr. Hudson in the name of Wayne Carpenter on Mr. Halladay's instruction. The horse was not required by the college and the requisition was rejected by Dean Cox who refused to pass it. Wayne Carpenter is Mr. Halladay's son-in-law.

23. College cattle was pastured for payment on a farm known as the Nickerson Farm, in which the following persons connected with the college had a proprietary interest:

Jacob Schepers, treasurer of the college; Ward Giltner, dean of division of veterinary science; I. F. Huddleston, research associate in bacteriology; W. L. Mallman, associate professor and research assistant in bacteriology; L. C. Emmons, professor of mathematics.

The cattle were under the jurisdiction of the veterinary division at the time they were pastured on the farm.

24. As of May 1932, there were 208 related persons on the staff of the college. At April 1933 the number of related persons on the staff was 153.

25. Up to February 1933 the college carried a rural-press specialist on its staff at a salary of $1,500 per annum. We have been unable to find copies of any college articles prepared by the specialist. Our investigation disclosed that the last specialist employed regularly prepared for his own clients a "confidential bulletin" and a "legislative letter" which was mimeographed from college stencils on college paper by college employees without charge to the specialist.

26. At March 31, 1933, the college general-fund assets exceeded the general-fund liabilities by $633,912.85. This excess is actually a reserve which has been built up from the accumulation of unexpended appropriations, etc., and is available for general operations to the extent that the assets can be liquidated.

27. The operation of the college music department for the 4 years ended June 30, 1928, cost $71,239.88. The cost of operation increased to $192,615.75 for the 4 years ended June 30, 1932, an increase of $121,375.87. This increase has taken place since the music department became affiliated with the Michigan State Institute of Music and Allied Arts. The increase has been caused principally by $34,327.54 paid in fees by the college to the institute for instruction of college students under institute staff and an increase of $84,208.80 in salaries paid to music-department instructors.

28. The Michigan State Institute of Music and Allied Arts is a nonprofit corporation organized under the laws of the State of Michigan.

29. Mr. Lewis Richards, who is the head of the college music department, received a salary of $5,000 (reduced to $4,650 in current year) from the college. Mr. Richards is also director of the music institute and as such has received 25 percent of all fees paid by the college to the institute for instruction of college students under institute staff. He has received 100 percent of all fees of institute students whom he taught personally, and, except in a few instances, he has received 25 percent of all fees paid by institute students for instruction. Mr. Richards has been allowed leave of absence for making personal appearances at concerts for remuneration, and has also received remuneration for appearances at Michigan State College student concert course.

30. The Michigan State Institute of Music and Allied Arts has occupied buildings owned and serviced by the college since 1929, and the college has received no remuneration for the use of the buildings or services rendered.

31. Since 1929 the college and college students have paid the Michigan State Institute of Music and Allied Arts $59,183.47 in fees.

32. The institute has collected since 1929 and retained $5,258.67 from students practicing in college-owned and serviced rooms on instruments rented by the institute.

33. The institute has retained $4,026.08 of profits made since 1929 on the Michigan State College student concert course.

34. The institute, starting in the year ended June 30, 1931, and continuing down to March 31, 1933, has collected and retained $11,027.73 from college students receiving their instruction under salaried college instructors. The students paid the institute for instruction for which the college had paid the salaries of the instructors.

35. From 1929 to March 31, 1933, the institute paid out in percentages and salaries to its instructors and its directors more than its income from fees (excluding the $11,027.33 mentioned in the previous paragraph).

The cost of the investigation was $6,500, representing the fees for the audit of the books of the college and the music institute for the 4 years and 9 months period ended March 31, 1933. The auditors also conducted investigations of other organizations connected with the college and checked the veracity of information which came to the attention of the committee. An examination was also made by the auditors of approximately 85 revolving and other funds which are connected with the college, the complete details of which are not recorded on the general college records.

The audit work has been carried out to the complete satisfaction of the committee.

Previous audits made at the college were cash audits of a superficial nature and did not contain the information required by the committee for its investigation.

The committee's investigation disclosed that Frank S. Kedzie, college historian, who had been in the employ of the college for 52 years; Joseph Frank Cox, dean of agriculture, who had been in the employ of the college for 20 years; and James B. Hassleman, director of publications department, who had been in the employ of the college for 17 years, were discharged without a hearing because they objected to many of the practices brought out in this report. These men were treated unfairly and there was no basis for their discharge.

RECOMMENDATIONS

We recommend that the Music Institute be entirely divorced from the college and removed from the college buildings and grounds.

We recommend that all connection between college officials and employees and the East Lansing State Bank, East Lansing, Mich., be discontinued.

We recommend that the state board of agriculture desist from paying any commissions to or making any contract, other than for their regular salaries, with its architect, landscape architect, or other members of its staff.

We recommend that the attorney general of the State of Michigan take proper steps to recover public funds which have been unlawfully taken or expended by the state board of agriculture or its agents.

We recommend to the Governor of the State of Michigan that he examine the testimony taken by the committee with a view to removing the members of the state board of agriculture if he deems that the testimony warrants such action.

EDWARD B. MCKENNA, Chairman,
BEN CARPENTER,
SAMUEL W. RAYMOND,
RAY DERHAM,

Members of the Committee Investigating the Administration of the Affairs of the Michigan State College of Agriculture and Applied Science Under Senate Resolution No. 27, Dated February 28, 1933.

JUNE 14, 1933.

Mr. HOOK. During the brief interim of Michigan's Democratic State administration of 1933 and 1934, facts were brought to light by a Michigan Senate investigation showing a shocking state of affairs at Michigan's great pioneer College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts—not just one of those faculty rows involving squabbling professors but in this case college officials and State board members were all hooked up together in a private music institute, a bank handling college funds without adequate protection or interest, land deals, shortages in the military account, in fact some 30 questionable, illegal, or irregular items were enumerated in the report of the senate committee of 1933. Men high in G. O. P. party councils were involved. A thorough cleanup has been delayed, but since the senate findings the college secretary resigned, the college treasurer now faces charges for failure to account for moneys in his hands, and I have this week received a clipping from the State Journal of Lansing, Mich., of April 10, 1936, stating that the M. S. C. military shortage probe is to be resumed and that the State police are now working on the missing $8,000 of R. O. T. C. funds. The article states that the shortage in funds was discovered during the time a grand jury investigation was being conducted at the college 4 years ago. A true statement of news facts would be that the one-man grand jury conducted by Judge Leland Carr and the report by Special Assistant Attorney General Joseph Baldwin stated that no such shortage existed, thus protecting the guilty parties. The honest rural press of the State called these findings a "whitewash" at the time. The Lansing State Journal is one of the papers that was all that time VANDENBERG controlled. Joseph Baldwin, through influence of Senator VANDENBERG, was appointed from his district as first assistant doorkeeper of the United States Senate in 1931 and 1932. The first job of this politically obligated attorney in Michigan was as this special assistant attorney general of the State of Michigan, appointed in Governor Brucker's regime, to investigate the Michigan State College affair, and he did what no reputable attorney would do in protecting political malefactors. The involved State board of agriculture fired the illustrious Dr. Frank S. Hedzie, the grand old man of the institution, and two other objectors to dishonesty.

It is of interest that Governor Brucker this week announced his candidacy for nomination for the United States Senate. He would like to occupy the seat long held by the senior Senator of Michigan, JAMES M. COUZENS.

There are other connections that show the adroitness of this political gang. A Mr. Gilbert Daane, who is a banking associate of the junior Senator from Michigan, was nominated for the Board of Agriculture by the G. O. P. in 1932, replacing a former Board member who had made an effort to clean things up at M. S. C. Daane did not have the vote of the convention, but they gave him the nomination regardless—bad business even for the G. O. P.

Another unusual connection is indicated by the active part played by Mr. Fred L. Woodworth, Michigan's former Republican collector of internal revenue and the campaign manager for Michigan's junior Senator, in actively lobbying among the State legislators to prevent any action that they might take to correct the shocking state of political control at the Michigan State College. According to dependable authority, Mr. Woodworth received pay for his services as a lobbyist from the Michigan State Board of Agriculture—taxpayers' money used to protect guilty parties. As reported by the Michigan press, Mr. Woodworth is the man who at the recent Republican "blue grass" convention at Cleveland, whispered the name of VANDENBERG in the ears of receptive delegates as a likely G. O. P. Presidential candidate.

With increasing frequency of late, the stentorian tones of the junior Senator from Michigan have resounded through the United States Senate. He is already hailed by many Republicans as the "plumed knight" of the Republican Party who may carry the gonfalon of the G. O. P. at the next election.

"Sanctity of our courts" and "freedom of the press" are the two main themes of Senator VANDENBERG, who apparently desires to implant the idea in the minds of his hearers that these paladiums of liberty have in some way been endangered by the New Deal in bringing the Nation from the depths of the Hoover panic of 1932 to the present state of well-advanced recovery. The junior Senator from Michigan is an orator of the old school, the very epitome of "pomp and circumstance" as he paces back and forth upon the Senate floor—a champion full worthy of the pelf and power faction of the old guard. Hamilton is his ideal, about whom he has written two books—the Hamilton who opposed the farmer and who looked upon the people collectively as "a dangerous beast."

The courtesy that I, as a Congressman, must extend in these Chambers toward the junior Senator from my State forbids my presenting here further details regarding the muzzling of the press, and the political prostitution of the judiciary of my State by G. O. P. factions, but recent developments remind me of a remark made by a wise old farmer of a central Michigan county in discussing the chances of a local Republican candidate for election as county supervisor: "Well", said the old-timer, "everyone knows that Mel sucks eggs, but he's durn good at hiding the shells." Until very recently the old-guard gang of Michigan have been "darn good at hiding the shells", but some of them, though carefully hidden, are coming to light.

The political henchmen of this gang are desirous of widening the scope of their influence by invading the broader field offered with Washington, D. C., as headquarters. As political machines go, this latest model Michigan machine is worthy of attention. Like the latest model 1936 Michigan automobiles it is streamlined and efficient, equipped with silent transmission and oil immersion shock absorbers—a great improvement over the Hoover-Hyde or the Harding-Dougherty models. This is the machine, "body by the G. O. P.", "powered by VANDENBERG and Brucker", that the old-guard gang of Michigan would like to wheel into the White House garage.

This is the machine they would like to wheel into the White House garage next November, but I cannot agree with my distinguished friend from Massachusetts that this Republican machine will go in there at any time. The honest people will not approve when all the facts are brought to light.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have been endeavoring to ascertain from the gentlemen in charge of this debate just how much longer it is to be permitted to go on. I gather the impression that if no one interferes to stop us it will go on until 5 o'clock; also the impression that there is but one remaining orator on the other side of the aisle, which indicates that between us we shall consume perhaps an hour and 15 minutes. Of course, that will involve no effort on my part and does not dismay me in the slightest degree.

Mr. Chairman, I am a little unconventional in that I will have to confess at the outset I have never been excluded from a committee room. In fact, the committee room that has become so famous during this debate is one in which I would not care to force entry during a Democratic discussion of a tax bill. I cannot therefore claim any grievance upon this occasion, nor do I know anything about the horrid conditions existing in the State of Michigan as described to us by the gentleman who has just preceded me, and which bear such a close relation to this tax bill.

Upon one or two occasions as this debate has proceeded, Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to remind the Chair and the Committee that the rule under which this debate is conducted provides that remarks shall be confined to the bill itself. Again I shall be unconventional in that I shall obey the rule; otherwise apparently it has not been worth the paper it is written on.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman has not adhered to the rule up to this point.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I beg the indulgence of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Do not withdraw it. I desire to be disciplined.

Mr. Chairman, my remarks up to this moment will be recognized, of course, by all veteran legislators as of the graceful and introductory character. I shall be guilty of rambling in the few comments I shall make, and I think I will not consume 30 minutes unless I am suitably and frequently interrupted. In the few comments I shall make upon this bill I desire first to speak about that provision which relates to the so-called "windfall" tax. I venture to do so because practically all of my life I have been engaged in the livestock business and thus have come into rather intimate contact with the packing business.

As I understand it, and I shall be glad to be corrected if I state this erroneously, the bill provides in effect that in the event a processor has passed the tax on to the consumer and thus has not been put out of pocket himself under the processing-tax law recently declared unconstitutional, he may be called upon to refund a sum of money equal to a certain percentage of the sum which he presumably pocketed at the expense of the consumer. I may state that awkwardly, but I am sure the members of the committee present know what I am driving at.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to confine my remarks to the effect of this provision upon the packing business. I am not at all concerned as to its effect upon the so-called big packer. The processing tax on hogs did not fall with as heavy weight on the big packing institutions. It was possible for them to absorb this tax in part at least, and perhaps in a good many instances entirely. As to the exact facts upon that situation I am not informed. But the big packer had this advantage: The processing of hogs was only a portion of his business. He also processed beef cattle against which there was no processing tax. He also processed mutton and lamb against which there was no processing tax. He also engaged in the purchase and resale or preparation and processing of several other articles, many of them byproducts, some of them medicinal, some of them relating to the hide industry, and some of them to the fertilizer industry. In other words, his operations were diffused and scattered over a wide area, and it is safe to say that about three-quarters of them was free from any processing tax.

There are, however, in this country, and doubtless the members of the Ways and Means Committee know this as a result of the hearings, something like 1,100 pork packers who do nothing else except handle hogs and process them into pork products of one kind or another. They do not handle cattle, and they do not handle sheep.

They manufacture very, very few of the byproducts which the big packers manufacture. All their eggs, so to speak, are in the hog basket.

The processing tax fell as a heavy burden upon their entire business. Now, the tax was computed at the rate of 2¼ cents a pound, live weight, on a full-grown hog. Hogs were selling during most of that period in the neighborhood of 10 cents a pound on the Chicago market; in other words, the processing tax amounted to 25 percent of the cost of the raw material. I think no one will deny that this is a tax of extraordinary severity to be imposed upon any business.

The small pork packer was constantly put into difficulties, and I know of several of them. Of course, an effort was made at the beginning, and naturally so, as any businessman would make it, to pass the tax on to the consumer. The effort was not successful after a comparatively short experiment. Then an effort was made, of course, by the businessman running the pork-packing establishment to try to reimburse himself by paying less money for the live hogs, by taking it out of the producer. That did not work very well, because in the meantime the large packers were enabled to pay the full price for live hogs and absorb, in whole or in part, the processing tax imposed solely on the pork processing, but not imposed upon their other great undertakings.

There are about 1,100 of these small pork-packing concerns. Many began to go into the red. Most of them went into the red almost entirely as a result of this processing tax.

There is one concern of excellent reputation located near my home district, and I have no doubt my friend, the gentleman from New York, and my neighbor from Monroe County will recollect the identity of this concern—it is not profitable to mention it—had to take steps to put itself into the hands of a receiver. It withheld the payment of the tax, but had to deposit the money in the jurisdiction of the Federal court pending the decision of the Supreme Court on the Triple A.

In the meantime all preparations were made for putting the concern in the hands of a receiver, because with the payment of the tax it was finally decided the company would have to go out of business. It could not meet its obligations. It had been losing money too fast and over too long a period. Fortunately for it, the Triple A decision came along and the money that had been impounded was turned back to it, the receivership proceedings were withdrawn, the company has managed to survive and is now doing business, employing several hundred people and buying hogs all through the farming region of western New York. Had it not been for the Triple A decision this company would have closed, solely as a result of the processing tax.

Now, as I read this bill, and I may be mistaken, this company will have to prove and carry the burden of proof, that it did not pass on the taxes which it was able to pay up to the time it found itself unable to pay any longer; that it absorbed the taxes itself and that the consumer of the finished pork products paid no portion of them in the increased price of the retail goods.

How is the company going to prove this? How will they go about demonstrating it, Mr. Chairman? If this company, or any other pork-packing company, sold but one article, we will say sausages, and no other article or no other form of pork products, it might be possible to trace on the books of the company the actual cost of producing the sausages and subtract that from the ultimate price charged to the consumer and say, "There is your profit and we can tell whether or not you passed on the two and a quarter cents live-weight processing tax in the form of the finished sausage priced higher to the retailer." But, Mr. Chairman, concerns in the packing business do not do that kind of business. They market several different products—hams, sausages, pork, fresh pork, shoulders, bacon, different brands and types and quality, which are advertised, as you see them advertised all over the country. These articles go into the channels of commerce over a huge area and reach all kinds of markets. The prices are not uniform amongst them from month to month. If one article is not selling well they may reduce the price in order to boost its sale. If it is selling well they may keep the price up. If the price of one of their brands goes up or down, who can tell whether the processing tax had anything to do with it or not?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Did the concern to which the gentleman refers have any net income during the period involved?

Mr. WADSWORTH. A net income?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes; a taxable net income.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not informed authoritatively, but in view of the fact that it was on the verge of going into receivership, I imagine it was not enjoying any net income.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. My understanding is if it did not show a net income, there would be no tax under the "windfall" provision.

Mr. WADSWORTH. All right; suppose it showed a slight income.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Then, of course, the factors in regard to passing it on or having absorbed it would apply. Most of the small packers maintain that they absorbed it; that competitive conditions were such that they could not pass it on. This was the proof or the testimony before the committee.

The gentleman refers to the burden of proof. He recognizes that there is a prima-facie presumption which may be rebutted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Either party may rebut, but the Government does the assuming.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman realizes that the facts are in the possession of the taxpayer, and to put the burden of proof on the Government would be an interminable proposition.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think at the best this thing is going to be an interminable proposition. You will have lawsuits, litigation, expert accountants, investigations month after month, litigation year after year to find out whether the tax was passed on or not.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman knows that we have thousands of cases under existing law involving the interpretation of taxes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And you are adding to that situation, and that is not good law.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If there was no net income there is no "windfall" tax.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman from Kentucky says we have numerous litigations in other tax laws. There is a terrific expense incident to the paying of taxes, the legal fees of the attorneys or experts paid by the taxpayer before he pays his tax. This is adding more expense to that group which is now and has been for 2 years near the rocks. You are going to bring these people into litigation in a desperate endeavor to save themselves and in the long run the Government will not get much.

This burden is to be imposed upon a group of industries which today are on the narrow edge, generally speaking, who were burdened terribly by the processing tax. That is admitted. Now Uncle Sam comes along and with a sneer—make no bones about it—with a sneer and innuendo against their integrity and character says, "We are going to get you and make you pay." From what will they pay you back? I am pleading for the small people. I am not pleading for the big packer.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Is the gentleman in favor of the packer being unjustly enriched?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, these packers were not unjustly enriched.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If not, they will not have this burden imposed on them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But they will have to prove that they were not. I am in favor of the Government taking its medicine when it is wrong. Who passed this act that was unconstitutional? The Congress of the United States. It put you in a hole as to revenues. Whose fault is it?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. What right has any packer or anybody else collecting processing taxes from somebody below to keep them in his pocket and become unjustly enriched?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, there the gentleman goes again with his "unjustly enriched" business.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The questions, however, will be determined by the Bureau of Internal Revenue and by the courts, just as questions of fact are determined under existing law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. All right. Drag this little fellow in, drag him through all the courses of litigation, with the Government's lawyers, paid for by the taxpayers, litigating as long as the Government desires, bringing this citizen in and trying to shake him down. Why? Because you made a mistake in passing the Triple A. What right had Congress to pass the Triple A in the first place? Tell me that.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Oh, it would take me longer than the gentleman would give me time to do that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] has made a pertinent observation in the application of this law. Section 501, page 231, line 5, says:

> The net income of every person which arises from the sources specified below.

Here the law is referring to specific sources of income. What is that source? That source of income is the processing-tax feature. I have in mind a packer, such as described by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], who had a loss during 1933 and 1934, and in 1935, since the Supreme Court decision, he has had refunded or returned to him $101,000 in processing taxes. Suppose in 1936 he has a net income, we will say, of $75,000, and into his gross proceeds have gone that $101,000 which the Government returned to him. Will he have to return 80 percent of $75,000 of it, or 80 percent of the $101,000 under the provisions of this bill which says:

> The net income of every person which arises from the sources specified below.

That is one question. If I may be permitted, let me submit this: Suppose that in 1934 and 1935 while the processing tax was running, this processing-tax feature came into his business. It was during 1934 and 1935 that he made this collection through sale of goods. This law applies specifically to income arising from sources specified below, and the law becomes effective January 1, 1936, and subsequent thereto. Will they go back and apply the $101,000 which was incurred in his 1933 income, his 1934 income, and his 1935 income, or will it be applied in 1936 only?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not think there is any application whatever to moneys that have been refunded in 21 (d). This does not seek to reach those moneys.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman means to say since the Supreme Court decision?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Oh, no.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If since the Supreme Court decision the moneys which were impounded——

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Oh, that is different. That is not a question of moneys refunded. Moneys impounded and paid to him is a different proposition, but the gentleman used the term "refunded", and I thought he was speaking of refunding under section 21 (d). The first thing you have to determine is what happened to the tax. If the tax has been absorbed, as the small packer maintains very strenuously—and he impresses me with the nature of his testimony that he did absorb it, that the competitive conditions were such that he necessarily had to absorb it—and having absorbed it, there will not be any basis on which you will levy the 80-percent rate.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Whether he had an income or not?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Whether he had an income or not. There is nothing plainer in this bill than that if he absorbed the tax there will be no "windfall" tax collected from him.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Suppose in other conditions which have been apparent, this firm has lost in 1933, 1934, and 1935?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In one business, in the pork business?

Mr. CRAWFORD. In the business of purchasing hogs on the hoof.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I say there will be no "windfall" tax.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Although he receives back the $101,000?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If there is not any income, there is not any "windfall" tax. Net income with reference to business revolving around the commodities upon which the processing tax has not been paid.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman makes that interpretation in spite of the fact that the law says upon "net income of every person which arises from the sources specified below"?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I state that is my understanding of what this statute is.

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York permit me to ask a question of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If I may have assurance of being allowed to extend myself, I yield.

Mr. MAIN. The language at the top of page 220, "to be collected and paid for each taxable year." Is it contemplated that this provision shall apply to anything other than the conditions which developed under the A. A. A. law?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. No, sir.

Mr. MAIN. Why should it not be limited, then, to the period under which the A. A. A. was in operation?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman repeat his question? Perhaps I did not understand him.

Mr. MAIN. The language is "paid for each taxable year." That is at the top of page 220. Does not the theme of unjust enrichment apply specifically to this situation which developed under the A. A. A. legislation?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. As a practical matter, it deals with A. A. A., but as a matter of law this is permanent legislation and goes from year to year. However, as a practical matter, it applies to the transactions to which I think the gentleman refers.

Mr. MAIN. Does the gentleman conceive of any other situation to which that might apply than the impounding of funds which developed under the A. A. A. law?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. There might be some.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to pursue the discussion of the so-called "windfall" tax but for a moment longer. I cannot boast of any intimate knowledge of the problems of bookkeeping and accounting. I venture the assertion that the enactment of this legislation will inaugurate a long period of litigation, the expense of which will be an added burden to these people. Of course, the Government never cares how much money it spends in litigation. The poor citizen has to out of his own pocket. I may be wrong about it. I would not impugn the motives of the gentleman who wrote this section. I am not sure where it was written. It may have been written in the Committee on Ways and Means, but it was discussed sometime before that, and I imagine it was started long before the committee itself sat down to write this bill. But from the very beginning I have not been able to divorce myself from the opinion that it was born in a spirit of vindictiveness. Someone had to get even with somebody else in order to cover up an error. We will let it drop at that.

Mr. Chairman, may I say a word or two on what I conceive to be the philosophy underlying that portion of the bill which would impose a tax upon surpluses of corporations? The matter has been touched upon in very able manner by several gentlemen who have already addressed the Committee. I shall not go into that side of it at any length because it has been well covered. Incidentally, the attendance this afternoon is exactly in inverse ratio to the importance of the measure, not an unusual spectacle in the House of Representatives. I say that not by way of scolding my colleagues but to remind them that it is this kind of situation that puts the Senate of the United States in control of legislation. We allow 8 hours or 10 hours or 16 hours to debate a bill which is positively revolutionary in character as it relates to the taxation of corporations. It will be rewritten in the Senate, and the whole country expects it. Thus does the House of Representatives represent. This House is an institution. For me it holds traditions.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York 10 additional minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. For me this House represents and holds very dear traditions. I have been privileged to be a Member of it going on 4 years; delighted to be a Member of it; proud of it; but dismayed, from time to time, in that under its procedure it surrenders, in large part at least, its legislative discretion to another body. That hurts. Under the Constitution we are to originate measures for raising revenue. My observation has been during the past 2 or 3 years that we do not originate much more than the enacting clause; that another body takes it over, and we wait for the conference report. So here we are, 30 or 40 of us this afternoon, discussing the most important revenue bill presented in the last 10 years.

As to the philosophy underlying it, in part at least——

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. What benefit would there be in unlimited debate if no more Members are interested than the gentleman just referred to?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I suppose I may be making an observation which seems unjust or unwarranted. Perhaps this present situation is due to the existence of the enormous Democratic majority in this House. I am not saying that as a criticism of the Democrats, but when this huge majority brings in a bill and it is announced as a majority bill, and the majority is 3 to 1, I suppose the tendency on the part of nearly all of us is to accept the fact that it is going to pass. It may be due to that political situation in the House, which may not last forever, that this situation exists today.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Would the gentleman state that the other body dominates this body or dominates legislation, or that more of the policies or views of the other body are found in laws when they are finally enacted than of this body? That has not been my experience since I have been here.

Let me say that our conferees have not submitted supinely to the views of the other body. We have given and taken as a coordinate body should; and I am sure the gentleman, fair as he is, fine as he always is, would not want to make the statement that this body is completely dominated by the other body.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Rather am I expressing only an opinion.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I wonder if, on second thought, that is the gentleman's opinion, if that is the gentleman's conviction.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps the opinion has been frozen into a conviction in my own mind. It is not important.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My opinion is that step by step—and I am going to be perfectly frank about this, although I do not like making the suggestion—that step by step the House of Representatives is losing place as an institution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to digress upon a subject which may be disagreeable, but it has been in my mind for some time and may have some bearing upon the consideration of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I have been looking back over the history of the so-called New Deal legislation very studiously for some time, as well as the utterances of its champions, especially the utterances of the President of the United States and his principal lieutenants. I have made this observation before; I am now going to make it upon the floor: In none of those utterances, be they the utterances of the President or of any of his principal lieutenants, have I been able to find the word "thrift." Not once has the President of the United States in 3½ years exhorted his people to frugality—not once.

Thrift as a virtue is not important in the New Deal; it does not appear in their theory of government; nor is thrift to be considered by the individual. We hear, rather, of planned economy; and this bill is a part of the planned economy, an expression coined by the President himself. We hear also, Mr. Chairman, the phrase "disciplined democracy", coined by Dr. Tugwell. The two go together. If economy is planned there must be obedience to it, and obedience is obtained only through the imposition of discipline—a disciplined democracy. It is a philosophy, Mr. Chairman, which underlies and has underlain a long succession of measures that have been presented to the House and to the Senate since March 4, 1933. And this measure is in line with those which have preceded it, the disciplining of the management of business, the penalizing of thrift exercised by a corporation. Thrift counts for nothing in this program and discipline counts for everything. That is the road we are traveling. We have been traveling it steadily, step by step, sometimes without our realizing it, for 3 years. It represents a philosophy of government. It may be the human race has reached a stage where it needs disciplining by its government; that every individual in the land has reached a point in his development where he would be happier and more contented and more secure if government planned how he should earn his living.

But let us not mistake the tendency or the road; this is what we are doing, step by step. True, the Supreme Court has suspended, for the time being at least—and the Lord knows how long it will last—two of the major efforts toward the disciplining of democracy, of a planned economy of life, in the N. R. A. decision and the famous A. A. A. decision. For the time being these two things are out of the window; but you and I know the effort has not ceased; that this very day efforts are being made to try to find some way of getting around those decisions. We have tried it in one respect with the Soil Conservation Act.

This is another way of disciplining agriculture. Obedience in this case is to be purchased. The element of force does not appear in the Conservation Act as it appeared in the Potato Act, the Tobacco Control Act, and the Bankhead Cotton Control Act, in all three of which appeared the club of the policeman raised over the individual farmer lest he disobey. In N. R. A. the same element of force was present. These two things are suspended for the moment, but you remember the very evident disappointment of the leader of this movement when the N. R. A. decision was handed down. A protest against that decision came from the White House.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield for the moment. The country was reminded through a long interview with the newspaper press that the Government of the United States, despite its constitutional form and its being a Federal Union of States, should enjoy the same power over those things as the governments of Europe today enjoy them. Make your comparisons, my friends, make your comparisons.

Mr. Chairman, this attempt to compel business corporations, great or small, to stop accumulating surplus for a rainy day is a part of this movement.

We are now employing the power to tax in order to achieve the objective. Men who have spoken upon this floor before me, Mr. Chairman, have brought this out at least in part. It is the road we are traveling, and it should attract the serious thought and deep concern of every man who loves American institutions, for if we travel this road to its logical goal we shall no longer be a Federal Union of States; we shall be an empire with all power centered at Washington, put into the hands of a vast bureaucracy, who, with the stroke of a pen, can tell me how many acres I shall plant, and tell you how many dollars you may save. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] refers to two acts of the Federal Congress that were stricken down by the Supreme Court of the United States, namely, the N. R. A. and the A. A. A. He cites the two acts as being in a chain or in a sequence of legislation looking toward a disciplined people.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call his attention to the fact that the N. R. A. was brought to the Ways and Means Committee by a distinguished constitutionalist. It was brought physically in drafted form to our committee by the Honorable Lewis Douglas, then Director of the Budget, and now one of the most active critics of New Deal legislation. The members of the Ways and Means Committee had served with Lewis Douglas and we knew his philosophy and his conservatism. He brought the bill to the Ways and Means Committee. He was designated by the Secretary of the Treasury as his spokesman and his representative. We leaned heavily upon his words.

The gentleman from New York speaks of industry being disciplined or hamstrung. May I say to my friend from New York that following the testimony of William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, a distinguished leader of industry appeared before the Ways and Means Committee advocating and pleading for the N. R. A. This was Mr. Harriman, then president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, and he begged and pled for the National Industrial Recovery Act.

You will find in the printed hearings that not only did he advocate its passage, to give industry an opportunity to have fair return upon its capital, but he went so far as to say that the Agricultural Adjustment Act then upon the statute books should not be referred to as merely legislation for the farmer, but that the A. A. A. was a bill which would benefit industry as well as the farmer. He stated that in bringing increased purchasing power to the farmer the bill in reality was one helping industry itself.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. Lewis Douglas, in my judgment, was one of the most honorable men I ever sat with in the House of Representatives, but he probably could not take orders any longer, and that is the reason he resigned as one of the Budget officers. He was requested to do something he did not believe in perhaps.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. As usual, the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania pulls down the curtain before his intellectual processes. I referred to the fact that Lewis Douglas brought the N. R. A. bill to the Ways and Means Committee and advocated its passage. We had a right to feel he did this in good faith.

Mr. RICH. He probably did that under orders.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And I think Mr. Harriman spoke in good faith when he represented the United States Chamber of Commerce at that time. With industry and labor united we reported favorably and passed the legislation urged by Lewis Douglas.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, under our two-party system of government the minority is the balance wheel for the majority. This has always been the case, where the minority does its duty.

When the majority brings in a bill that is not sound, it devolves upon the minority to rectify any errors it contains, and to make it sound, and to make a good bill out of a bad bill.

The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is a leader of his party. He is a spokesman for his party. He has had distinguished service in both the House and Senate. When he believes that the majority has brought in a bad tax bill it devolves upon the shoulders of himself and his party to make that tax bill good, if possible, and to have his complete minority army here on the floor to help him do the fighting.

Of all the Members who should have remained silent about not all of the 435 Members being present here this afternoon to consider this bill, he should have been the one, because when he gets up here as the mouthpiece of his party, speaking for his party and talking about the small number present, his party forces should be here to listen to him and to back him up in what he does. He did not count. He had just 14 stalwart Republicans here to back him up—just 14—while he was speaking.

By actual count there were 14 of his party here to hear his melodious voice, and he spoke 40 minutes, and not one single constructive idea did he present to us. What has he to offer? What does this distinguished statesman, who has served in both the House and Senate, a distinguished mouthpiece for the Republican Party, offer to perfect this tax bill? I listened to him intently, but he proposed not an amendment.

If he has anything constructive to offer, the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] would welcome it, for he is one of the fairest men in the Nation, besides being one of the most delightful colleagues in the House. He will listen intently and patiently to anything constructive that the gentleman from New York may offer that will correct any evil which he thinks may be in this bill. Why did not the gentleman from New York tell us how to correct it? I have been working much of the afternoon on a very important conference that soon is coming up on a very important appropriation bill, but I got here in time to answer this, and I imagine that many other colleagues, both Democrats and Republicans, are in committee rooms doing important work.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I cannot yield.

Mr. RICH. Is the gentleman cutting down the appropriation bills?

Mr. BLANTON. I cannot yield. I am, however, doing everything that one Member possibly can do to cut down all appropriation bills and balance the Budget.

Mr. Chairman, levying and collecting taxes is the most unpleasant duty that any statesman has to perform. No one likes to levy taxes; no one likes to collect them. Unfortunately, the duty is on our party to levy and collect them. The distinguished chairman of this committee, one of the greatest committees of the House, and the members of his committee have done their duty bravely, facing an election, and knowing it is unpopular. They have stood up here like men and have performed their duty, and yet they are criticized for it. I take off my hat to them. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to speak out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, I hope it is not political.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, what is the gentleman going to talk about?

Mr. GREEN. I am going to speak about the tax bill insofar as it pertains to the Florida canal.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Is that in conformity with the policy of the majority leader?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman believe that since we have heard a 30-minute lecture upon government, the gentleman ought to have 5 minutes?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The majority leader has been objecting quite strenuously this afternoon and I do not know whether this is in harmony with his policy or not, and I am trying to help him out.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I am very grateful to the gentleman for his voluntary proffer of assistance, as I always am, but I may say to the gentleman that this is a unanimous-consent request and if the gentleman from Massachusetts or any other Member on his side or on my side sees fit to do so, of course, all he has to do is to rise and say, "I object."

Mr. MICHENER. Reserving the right to object, as I understand this rule—

Mr. RABAUT. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MICHENER. Then I submit a parliamentary inquiry if the regular order is demanded.

As I understood the rule, the debate was to be confined to the bill. If this is the rule I ask the Chair whether we may change the rule of the House by unanimous consent of the Committee, and I make the point of order that we cannot.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WARREN). The Chair, of course, holds that the Committee cannot change the rule or the agreement made in the House. The Chair has not been so stringent about enforcing the rule, because the subject of taxes opens up a very wide field, including appropriations and other things.

Mr. GREEN. In that connection, Mr. Chairman, the Florida canal will use funds that are raised as a result of the passage of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if this bill is for the Florida canal and that is the point the gentleman wants to make, then I shall have to object, because I cannot see how we can put this bill through for the Florida canal when the gentlemen on that side of the House are talking about the soldiers' bonus and the new agricultural appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard and the gentleman from Florida will proceed in order.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, if the minority desires to be that technical, although it has not been so in other cases, I ask permission to speak out of order in order to be in accord with the rules of the House. I have observed that you have not made the point against anyone else. However, if the minority does not desire to hear anything discussed about the Florida canal and if your party, as a party, is against the canal, I shall speak at a future time.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not discussing anything now, but is scolding the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida will proceed.

Mr. GREEN. If that is the position of the minority——

Mr. MAPES. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman is prefacing the remarks he intends to make, and the Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Florida will proceed in order.

Mr. GREEN. I wish to discuss the Florida canal and not the tax bill. If the Republicans insist on the point of order I will for the present defer and later discuss the canal.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I was surprised, in fact astounded, at a statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] in regard to the position of the President of the United States with respect to the enactment of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act. The gentleman stated, while the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] had the floor, that "this act was passed by the House against the wishes of the President of the United States. It was not on the 'must' list."

Then, later, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] stated that he had been informed that the F. D. I. C. was passed over the violent protest of the President of the United States.

Of course, I am not a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, but I had always understood that this act was an administration measure, that it was favored by the administration, and I have checked on the matter the best I can. I have conferred with two members of the Committee on Banking and Currency and they have both informed me that it was an administration measure, that the President of the United States was against the guaranty of bank deposits, but was in favor of insurance of bank deposits.

I am informed that he was 100 percent in favor of it. Beside the two persons I have spoken of, I called the White House but was unable to get in touch with the President, but I was assured by one familiar with the facts that the President was in favor of the legislation.

Now, my friends, if there is anything at all in the record of this administration that stands out more conspicuously, more clearly, as one of the great achievements of the administration, in contrast with the record of the previous administration, it is the record that this administration has made with reference to the banks of the country. [Applause.]

We all know full well the first act of the President of the United States when he assumed control of the affairs of the Government was to take prompt steps to make the banks safe for the depositors' money.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. I am in a good deal the same position as the gentleman in that I have not any direct information on the subject; but my understanding has always been, and I supposed it was generally understood to be the fact, that the guarantee bank deposit amendment was offered to the legislation in the Senate by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. I supposed that was a conceded matter of history.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Strange, indeed, that the Senator from Michigan, if he was so resourceful and so greatly interested in bank matters, did not take some steps before the banks fell into the condition that we found them. Why did not he and the previous administration do something to prevent the thousands of bank failures?

If there is any one outstanding achievement that towers above another it is the work done by the administration making the banks of this country safe and sound for depositors.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. Is not the gentleman from North Carolina avoiding the issue somewhat? My recollection is that the bill was passed by the House of Representatives as presented by the administration without this amendment in it. The amendment was put on in the Senate.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman knows that the President could have vetoed the bill. You cannot get by that way; you cannot deprive this administration of credit for the great work that has been done in banking reform. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT].

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I likewise did not think there was any controversy concerning the attitude of the President of the United States in respect to the insurance of bank deposits in the special session of the Seventy-third Congress which convened on March 9, 1933, and continued, I think, until the 15th of June 1933. It has been my purpose, and it has been the purpose of every member of the Banking and Currency Committee—and I am sorry there are not others here to answer my remarks in this respect—and the policy of every member of that committee has been to refrain from comment upon anything which has transpired in our committee in executive session. I want nothing which I say today to be interpreted as divulging any confidences of any of my fellow members on the Banking and Currency Committee as to what transpired in executive session. I say on my own responsibility as a member of that committee that as late as June 12, 1933, the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of this House was making an effort to bring out a bill to insure bank deposits, and I say in passing that this House and this Congress and this Nation owes a debt of gratitude to the tenacity and the fortitude of the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], for bringing the deposit insurance on to the floor and getting it passed. [Applause.]

The President in his inaugural address had suggested—and I do not attempt to quote him, because I do not remember his exact language—that something along the line of insurance of bank deposits was essential to the well being of the country.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. Is the gentleman discussing this bill or some other subject?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am answering the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will proceed in order.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for the balance of my time out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. GREEN. I make the point of order.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that.

Mr. GREEN. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. O Mr. Chairman, I cannot agree to that.

Mr. MICHENER. And I cannot agree to that in view of what took place before the gentleman from Michigan came into the Chamber.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will proceed in order.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, if the Members will remember, we had to meet a refunding operation in the Treasury of something like $600,000,000 of securities coming due in June 1933. A very estimable gentleman was at that time Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Woodin.

Mr. Woodin made a trip to New York about the 1st of April, as I recall it. From the date of the inaugural until the time Mr. Woodin returned from New York in the fore part of April, this House and our committee were very enthusiastic for the Steagall bill which would insure bank deposits. From that time on, although the committee was giving it some consideration, this House was not given the privilege of considering the insurance of bank deposits for the reason that an ultimatum had been passed down by Wall Street that if we passed a bill insuring bank deposits, or divorcing investment affiliates from banks, the banks would be in no financial position to help meet this refunding operation of June 1933, and for that reason the insurance of bank deposits remained a cold question until almost the date of adjournment, in fact until the 12th of June 1933, which was a Monday, succeeding the date when every one of us expected we would adjourn. It will be recalled that we were in session on Saturday the 10th until after 11 o'clock at night, expecting to adjourn on that Saturday night.

On the following Monday, the 12th, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] had this to say:

> Mr. Speaker, more than 100 Members of the House have signed an agreement to oppose any adjournment of Congress until the bank guaranty deposits bill shall be brought before the House and disposed of. I ask unanimous consent to insert that agreement with the names in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and the agreement with the names on the petition was published in the RECORD on page 5826, under date of June 12, 1933.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If I recall, the F. D. I. C. was passed in 1933.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In the Congress next preceding the Seventy-third Congress; in other words, in the Seventy-second Congress; before this present administration came into power, did not a bill pass the House of Representatives and die in the Senate, securing deposits in banks?

Mr. WOLCOTT. My memory is that the so-called Steagall bill was passed in the House in the Seventy-second Congress and died in the Senate.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Was the President opposed to that bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I cannot speak in that respect.

Mr. DOUGHTON. If he controls the House as it is said he does and the House membership is just a rubber stamp, then how was it that the bill passed the House against his wishes?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I cannot speak for the President in that respect, but I can speak from my own knowledge of what is contained in the RECORD of the special session of the Seventy-third Congress, that no interest whatsoever, from about April 1, 1933, until the date of the passage of the bill on the day of adjournment of that special session in 1933, was manifested by anyone connected with the executive establishment of this Government, to impel the passage of that legislation. You will remember very distinctly that at that time we were quite proud of the fact, at least, you on the Democratic side were, that you were following along with the President.

Mr. DOUGHTON. And we are proud of it yet.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The President of the United States made no statement whatsoever following up the recommendation that the banks should be a safe place in which to put the people's money, and it was through the tenacity of the chairman of your Committee on Banking and Currency here in the House and the junior Senator from Michigan in the Senate that the bill was finally enacted into law and passed by an overwhelming majority. The President saw what the sentiment of the Nation was and did not veto the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Where was the Senator from Michigan when it got to the Senate? Why did he let it fail over there?

Mr. WOLCOTT. He did not let it fail. He put it into law, and the compromise was that we insure, not as we passed the bill here, the first ten thousand, and 75 percent of the next forty thousand, and 50 percent of the balance, but that we insure deposits in full up to $2,500.

Mr. DOUGHTON. But you just said it failed over there. It did fail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Michigan 5 additional minutes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman is making a long statement, and I hope that before he gets through he will state on what authority he made the statement this afternoon that this act was passed against the wishes and influence of the President of the United States?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes, I say it; and I say it on my own responsibility, without divulging any confidences with regard to what transpired in executive sessions of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Did the gentleman talk with the President?

Mr. WOLCOTT. No; I did not.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Where does the gentleman get his information?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I know you have leaders who do speak for the President, and they spoke most decisively in the Committee on Banking and Currency, and told us that if we passed any deposit insurance bill or bill to divorce investment affiliates from banking, Wall Street would not take the Government obligations attending the refunding operations of June 1933. That seemed to be sufficient for you other leaders on your side of the House to let the matter remain dormant until, because of a filibuster in the Senate, we were kept in session until the 15th, when we expected to adjourn on the 10th, and an opportunity was thereby given to pass the bill.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GREEN. My point of order was that the gentleman from Michigan was not proceeding in order. He is not discussing the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has already yielded the floor and so the point of order is not in order. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN].

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means a question. The gentleman from Florida a few moments ago, in contending that his proposed remarks were in order, made the point that this bill is intended, in part, to provide funds for the Florida ship canal. Does the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of this House concur in that statement?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not concur in that particular statement. The purpose of this bill is to provide funds for the Treasury of the United States for the general expenses of the Government. It is not earmarked for any purpose. Part of the revenue might be used for that purpose, but the revenues provided by this bill are for the benefit of the Treasury of the United States. I think the gentleman understands that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair state that there now remains 5 hours and 36 minutes of general debate. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] controls 3 hours and 14 minutes, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] controls 2 hours and 22 minutes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 12395, the revenue bill of 1936, directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 11581. An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the foregoing bill, requests a conference with the House thereon, and appoints Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. GLASS, Mr. COPELAND, Mr. KING, Mr. NYE, and Mr. KEYES to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 788. An act for the relief of the International Mercantile Marine Co.;

S. 790. An act for the relief of the Compagnie Generale Transatlantique; and

S. 1138. An act for the relief of Art Metal Construction Co. with respect to the maintenance of suit against the United States for the recovery of any income or profits taxes paid to the United States for the calendar year 1918 in excess of the amount of taxes lawfully due for such period.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11035) entitled "An act making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12098) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes", disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. HALE, and Mr. NYE to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby resign as a member of the following committees, effective this date: Census, Invalid Pensions, Territories.

Respectfully yours,

JOSEPH L. PFEIFER,
Third District, New York.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as members of the committee to attend the funeral of the late JOHN T. BUCKBEE, the following Members of the House of Representatives: Mr. REED of Illinois, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. ALLEN, Mr. ADAIR.

THREE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY, FIRST PERMANENT SETTLEMENT IN DELAWARE RIVER VALLEY

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 499, authorizing and requesting the President to extend to the Government of Sweden and individuals an invitation to join the Government and people of the United States in the observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the first permanent settlement in the Delaware River Valley, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas there is to be held at Wilmington, Del., and Philadelphia, Pa., and at several places in other States, during the year 1938, celebrations commemorating the three hundredth anniversary of the first permanent settlement in the Delaware River Valley, said settlement being also the first settlement of the colony of New Sweden, which embraced parts of the present States of Delaware, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey; and

Whereas, in accordance with a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Delaware, approved March 30, 1935, the Governor of said State has appointed a commission of 11 members, designated as the Delaware Swedish Tercentenary Commission, with authority "to prepare plans for a fitting celebration by the State of Delaware on the occasion of the three hundredth anniversary in 1938 of the founding of the first permanent settlement and the establishment of the first permanent government upon the soil of Delaware * * *; and to cooperate with other commissions or committees representing the city of Wilmington; historical, patriotic, and other societies of the State of Delaware and other States; the governments of other States; and the National Governments of the United States and Sweden"; and

Whereas at its annual meeting held in Harrisburg, Pa., on January 17, 1935, the Pennsylvania Federation of Historical Societies (embracing 73 constituent historical societies) adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas plans are in preparation to celebrate the tercentenary of the landing of the Swedes on the Delaware and the establishment of the first permanent white settlement, and the first government in Pennsylvania, in 1638: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That this federation pledge its hearty endorsement to such commemoration; and

"Resolved further, That the President be authorized to appoint such committee or committees to represent this federation as may be necessary and to cooperate with similar New Jersey, Delaware, Swedish, or other committees."

Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That when, in the opinion of the President of the United States, it shall be appropriate for him to do so, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to extend to the Government of Sweden and such individuals as the President may determine an invitation to unite with the Government and people of the United States in a fitting and appropriate observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the first permanent settlement of Swedish colonists in Delaware, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey.

SEC. 2. There is hereby established a commission to be known as the United States Delaware Valley Tercentenary Commission (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission") to be composed of 15 commissioners, as follows: Five persons to be appointed by the President of the United States, five Members of the Senate to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The Commission, on behalf of the United States, shall cooperate with representatives of the States of Delaware and Pennsylvania in the appropriate observance of such anniversary, and shall extend appropriate courtesies to such representatives of the Government of Sweden, and other persons, as may respond to the invitation of the President extended as hereinbefore provided. The members of the Commission shall serve without compensation and shall select a chairman from among their number.

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000 to be expended by the Commission for expenses, including actual and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses incurred while discharging its functions under this resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

APPOINTMENT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 497

Resolved, That JOSEPH L. PFEIFER, of New York, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the standing Committee of the House of Representatives on Foreign Affairs.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL, 1937

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 11581) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to all the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate, and for the appointment of conferees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 11581), the District of Columbia appropriation bill, 1937, which the Clerk will report, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us how many amendments the Senate has placed on the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will remember that the House gave 3 full days to the consideration of this bill. The Senate committee put 87 amendments on it, all of which without reading passed the Senate yesterday without a word of discussion in 10 minutes. And one of the Senate amendments requires a contribution of $5,700,000 to be made by the taxpayers of Massachusetts, Oklahoma, New York, Texas, and the other States, on the local civic expenses of Washington people.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Will the conferees give more than 10 minutes' time and attention to the bill before they bring a report back to the House?

Mr. BLANTON. The conferees devoted many days to holding hearings, and used 3 days of the House to the consideration of the bill here on the floor. I think that is the answer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. CANNON of Missouri, BLANTON, JACOBSEN, JOHNSON of West Virginia, and DITTER.

THE FLORIDA CANAL

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, showing at Keith's Theater, in the city of Washington, this week is a picture styled "March of Time." A portion of this picture was probably planned as propaganda adverse to the canal across Florida. In some respects, however, the publicity given through this medium is a benefit to the Florida canal, and to the American people. It is beneficial in that it shows to the American people the magnitude of the project, its great importance, and its present vast benefits as a sound and justifiable unemployment-relief project. It shows huge machines which were manufactured in various parts of the country and the work giving direct employment to over 6,000 people at the place of construction, and giving indirect employment to a large additional number in all parts of the country.

An unusual feature of the picture is that occupied by a distinguished Republican presidential candidate from Michigan. It shows this Republican candidate enthused over the temporary victory in the other legislative branch when an amendment to appropriate funds for the canal was lost by one vote. That one could be so sectional and so partisan as to be proud over the temporary defeat of a project of undoubted permanent merit and of substantial benefit to the entire country is difficult for me to understand. The blocking of action in the matter will be temporary. Right will prevail. The American people will not permit the permanent defeat of a project of so great permanent improvement value to all sections of the country as is the Florida canal.

The picture is misleading in that it purported to show a general opposition to the project on the part of Florida celery growers, general vegetable growers, and fruit growers. This part of the picture is exaggerated and is misleading. It is not founded upon any real existing sentiment among the Florida vegetable and fruit growers. This purpose of the picture is to show opposition on the part of the fruit and vegetable growers for the alleged contention that the salt water of the proposed canal would damage Florida's underground fresh-water supply and thus destroy fruit and vegetable life. This contention is without competent engineering fact. Gen. E. M. Markham, Chief of United States Board of Army Engineers, recently said:

In my opinion, a sufficiency of information with respect to underground water supply has been gathered to make a determination of the effect of the canal on such supply. This Department, in its investigations of the canal, has utilized the services of expert geologists and water engineers. A special board of review, formed pursuant to instructions from the President, also had the services of a competent water engineer. The preliminary data gathered by the Department indicated that there was some possibility of adverse effects on the underground water supply. The more detailed information which is now available clearly indicates that the adverse effects are largely local and not of a serious nature. When the project was placed under way as a part of the relief program I had the district engineer at Ocala, Fla., assemble a board of selected experts to consider the data gathered by the two boards, the State geological department, and the Geological Survey, and to undertake additional and exhaustive field investigations. These experts have recently submitted their interim report, which definitely concludes that the effects of the sea-level canal on the underground water supply will not be serious but local in nature and capable of control with reasonable expenditures for remedial works. The authentic information available permits the conclusion that the sea-level canal will not contaminate the underground water supply of adjacent areas.

I quote General Markham because his authority is the highest engineering authority in our country. Other eminent engineers, among them Hon. H. H. Buckman, consulting engineer for the Florida Ship Canal Authority, concur in the conclusion that no serious damage will occur to Florida's underground water system and vegetable life. Fruit and vegetable growers in Florida generally are not fearful of adverse effects. I include a letter just received from Mr. James J. Taylor, of Ocala, Fla. He owns 25,000 acres of celery and citrus lands. Much of his land is now being cultivated as celery fields and orange groves. His letter follows:

APRIL 20, 1936.

Hon. R. A. GREEN, M. C.,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE GREEN: Being the owner of 25,000 acres of land in Marion County near the proposed Trans-Florida Ship Canal, as well as one of the largest celery growers in Florida, with about 250 acres planted to this crop, and a large grower of citrus fruits and general farm products, I have naturally been very much interested in the controversy as to the effect of digging this canal on farming, especially on the two above-named crops, celery and citrus fruits; also on our fresh-water supply.

After going over the reports of the eminent geologists and engineers who have made a careful study of the effects of this canal on farming and fruit growing, as well as the fresh water supply, I have reached the conclusion that the construction of this Gulf-Atlantic Ship Canal will not damage our crops and fresh water supply, but will be of great benefit to the whole State of Florida.

May I, therefore, respectfully urge you to continue your efforts to have the canal completed by the United States Army Engineers. We have every reason to believe we may trust them.

With personal regards, I am,

Yours very truly,

JAMES J. TAYLOR.

One W. E. Ellis, president of the Commercial Bank & Trust Co., of Ocala, Fla., has recently written me that, in his opinion, no serious damage will occur to Florida underground water supply nor to Florida fruit and vegetable industries. He is one of the largest property owners in the canal area of Florida, and urges completion of the project.

Ray & Davidson are owners of a large tract of land, including Silver Springs, adjacent to the city of Ocala, Fla. This is probably the largest spring in the world. From it flows an adequate supply of sparkling and pure water sufficient to take care of the needs of every citizen in the United States. It is undoubtedly the most gorgeous and beautiful spring in the world. All forms of Florida plant life and fresh-water fish and animal life are to be found there in unparalleled beauty and abundance. People from all over the world go to Florida especially to see this great display of subterranean beauty.

The investment of Ray & Davidson at Silver Springs is worth hundreds of thousands of dollars. These owners would be the last ones to advocate completion of the Florida canal if damage to Florida would accrue therefrom. Mr. W. C. Ray, of Ray & Davidson, has just written me as follows:

APRIL 16, 1936.

Hon. R. A. GREEN, M. C.,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN GREEN: With large investments at stake should there be damage to the fresh-water supply or a material lowering of the water level by reason of the construction of the Gulf-Atlantic ship canal, we have considered the effects of digging this waterway.

We are convinced, after talking with the United States Army Engineers on the job and after reading the conclusions of such eminent authorities as Sidney Paige, senior geologist, United States Army Engineers, Ocala, Fla., that there will be no material damage to agriculture, horticulture, or lowering of the water level that would permit damage to the fresh-water supply, even in our immediate proximity to the canal, much less to those parts of the State remotely removed from the excavations.

We, therefore, advocate the completion of the canal and believe that shipping safety, shortened distance, and lowered freight rates will benefit the entire State of Florida and the whole United States.

May we respectfully request your support in having this canal completed?

With personal regards, we are,

Sincerely yours,

RAY & DAVIDSON,
Proprietors.
By W. C. RAY.

I have received a large number of other communications disproving the fallacy that damage to Florida's water supply would result from the completion of the canal, but I shall not take your time to enumerate them.

In answer to an inquiry relative to the nature and extent of available traffic to warrant the ultimate expenditure of approximately $140,000,000, General Markham recently said:

The special board of engineers had available data compiled by the Department of Commerce. In addition, they made a detailed study to determine the economic benefits to transportation which would result from the construction of the canal. While this information and data have not been reviewed in detail by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, it is most complete and adequate for a full determination of the estimated value of the benefits to navigation which will result from its construction.

In commenting further relative to the economic justification of the project, General Markham continued:

The special board of Army Engineers made an extensive economic survey, and was aided in the preparation of its report by an independent survey undertaken by the Department of Commerce at the request of the Chief of Engineers. The determinations of the special board to shipping concerns, so that it might be informed as to their opinions with respect to the effect of the project on the individual interests of the companies concerned. In determining the economic justification of a proposed river and harbor improvement, the investigating officers ascertain the definite savings in time and distance which will be made available to navigation without increased hazards as a result of the improvement in question. These savings in time and distance converted into monetary savings and such other incidental benefits as clearly accrue to water-borne commerce and the general public interest, such as a reduction in the hazards of navigation, form the basis for the determination of the economic justification of a project. The views of navigation and commercial interests as to the effect which the proposed improvement may have on their operations are an aid to the board in weighing the public value of the savings and benefits as determined by the board.

Attention is invited to a recapitulation of the record as regards the findings of the several examining agencies with regard to cost and economic justification. In the first place, it should be borne in mind that the engineers of the Public Works Administration and the special board of survey of the Corps of Engineers developed their cost estimates from plans and specifications for a lock canal which varied in many important details. For instance, the engineers of the Public Works Administration planned a canal with two locks while the special board of survey considered a canal with three locks. Other important differences in plan and specifications make the estimates of total costs of these two examining agencies incommensurate. Again, the board of review developed its cost estimate from plans and specifications for a sea-level canal. As these board of review plans and specifications and cost estimate of $142,700,000 have been approved by the Chief of Engineers, these elements of the project may be considered as definitely determined. It remains to consider the benefits found by the examining agencies and to apply these benefits to the cost of the project. The method for determining the economic justification of a river and harbor project established and followed by the Corps of Engineers is as follows:

The direct benefits to commerce are determined as accurately as possible in terms of dollars and cents per year. From these direct benefits are deducted the annual cost of maintenance and operation of the improvement, and, in the case of a certain class of structures which are subject to depreciation, an additional annual amount is deducted to amortize such structures over a reasonable period of time. The net remainder of benefits, when capitalized at 3 percent, should exceed the estimated cost of the project if it is economically justified. Sometimes, when the whole project is subject to depreciation, the net annual benefits are capitalized at 4 percent in lieu of charging amortization. In the case of the canal under discussion, the only structures which are subject to depreciation are two small water-control works and certain bridges, the cost of which is less than 2½ percent of the total cost of the project.

On the basis of the methods customarily used by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors to determine the economic justification of a project the Florida ship canal is justified by wide margin. These methods are analogous to those used in commercial practice for work of a similar character.

Not only would the benefits to shipping exceed by a wide margin maintenance and operating costs and interest at the current rates as required by the Board of Engineers, but in approximately 32 years they would, in addition, more than amortize the original cost of the work plus interest during construction.

The return from tolls considered by the board of review is no longer an issue as the route is being opened as a free canal, as are other waterways of the United States.

It has been estimated by competent engineering authorities and by the Federal Department of Commerce officials that this canal when completed will save about $8,000,000 per year on the operating cost of ships which will use this canal; also, that it will save to consumers more than $30,000,000 per year in transportation-cost saving. It is estimated that 10,000 ships per year will transit it and that in these ships one and one-half times as much tonnage will be carried as now passes through the Panama Canal. Through the completion of the canal the storm hazard around the south end of the peninsula of Florida will be eliminated. As a national defense asset to our Nation the cost of construction of this canal is well justified.

Another thing of prime importance in this matter and one in which my colleagues should be interested is the obligation owed to the people of Florida. The State of Florida agreed with the Federal Government to deliver the right-of-way for the canal. On October 22, 1935, the counties in the canal zone of Florida voted a bond for a million and a half dollars, have sold the bonds, and have bought a large portion of the right-of-way, which has already been delivered to the Government. The citizens of Florida have performed their part of this obligation and the Government is morally bound to keep faith with the people of Florida and complete the project.

The President was given full authority and direction to begin the project through the passage of the W. P. A. bill last session of Congress. Acting under this full authority given him by Congress, he began the project and has allocated about 5½ million dollars for it. Recently, in the other legislative branch of our Government, on a point of order it was ruled that the project was properly authorized. I do not believe any parliamentarian or attorney in the House of Representatives will question the authorization of the project.

But getting back to the actual benefits which are now accruing to the American people as a result of work now going on on the canal, I include the following letter just received from Mr. J. W. Hill, a prominent citizen of Marion County, Fla., as follows:

OCALA, FLA., April 20, 1936.

The Honorable R. A. (LEX) GREEN,
Member of Congress from Florida.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN GREEN: Will you please give me enough of your valuable time to read the following?

First. I want to tell you who I am and what line of business I am in. I am a small broke businessman operating a foundry and machine shop.

Second. To my understanding, it is the aim of the President and his administration to put men to work, therefore I would like to call your attention to the fact that prior to September 3, 1935, there had been millions of dollars allotted to Florida for the relief-work projects. The workingman barely received enough to buy bread from the dollars that were sent to Florida for relief, which goes to show that very little benefit was derived by the people that really needed help or to the business enterprises, which is the backbone of this country.

Third. I see in the newspapers that President Roosevelt has taken a stand against heavy projects. The billion and a half dollars he is asking Congress for must be spent on jobs that are quick in order to put men to work. Just allow me to quote you a few figures on what the Florida canal did toward putting more men to work.

Prior to September 3, 1935, I was working two men, not including myself, in my shop. Less than 3 weeks after the canal was announced I had 10 men working, and they are still working today. Not only my business but every place of business in Ocala has had the same increase. For every man that was given a job directly on the canal there were two men given jobs in private businesses. When it is all figured out that the canal has helped each business in general it is as follows: There has been $5,400,000 allotted to the Florida Canal and today there is over $7,000,000 worth of machinery or equipment that private contractors are now using on this canal. This equipment was manufactured in the East, North, West, and Central States. It gave employment to thousands of men. There are more than 300 trucks and cars now in use on the canal job, and most of them were manufactured in the Honorable Mr. VANDENBERG's home State. Even his own people were greatly benefited by the project he is so cleverly fighting. The railroad companies alone have received more than $100,000 in freight for the hauling of this machinery for the contractors of this job. The express companies, the air lines, and every line of business in existence are receiving benefits from projects of this kind. There has been more than 5,000,000 feet of lumber used in connection with the canal projects. This lumber came from mills in Alabama, Georgia, and Florida, thereby giving employment to thousands of men.

You men that represent the people of Florida and the people of the United States can do more in putting men to work, not directly but indirectly, with $25,000,000 for the Florida canal than with $100,000,000 for such projects that have been approved in the past. Remember that it is this kind of projects that enable privately owned businesses to employ more men.

Let me hear from you.

Very truly yours,

J. W. HILL.

You will note from Mr. Hill's letter a brief statement of a portion of the benefits which this project is now carrying to practically every State in the Union. After it is completed every State in the Union will share for all generations to come great benefits. The same opposition which opposed the Panama Canal without ultimate success is opposing the completion of the Florida canal. This effort of the special interests will meet defeat in this case as in the Panama Canal, because the Florida canal will be completed. It is my intention to at a later date discuss this project in more detail and to give you further information and facts concerning the project. In the meantime, I urge each of my colleagues to make a thorough and careful study of this great project and the benefits which it will carry to our American people, and to cooperate for its completion as the project carrying the most lasting improvement of the present administration.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and to include therein three short letters and certain excerpts from a statement prepared by myself and Hon. H. H. Buckman on the Florida canal.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how much of the RECORD will these excerpts take?

Mr. GREEN. The matter is not very long; I would say it would take maybe a page or so.

Mr. RICH. Not over a page?

Mr. GREEN. I would not say that, it may be more than that, but it will not be very long.

Mr. RICH. But it will not be more than two pages?

Mr. GREEN. I cannot say.

Mr. RICH. If it is more than two pages, I object, and the gentleman will have an opportunity to find out how much space it will take.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. GREEN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I modify my request, and ask unanimous consent to include just the letters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida to include the letters referred to in his extension of remarks?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I am very much disappointed that my Republican colleagues take such an unusual attitude that they do not want a man even to express himself on a subject on the floor of this House. This is very unusual procedure. If they feel this is proper courtesy to a Member on the Democratic side of the aisle, in the future we can—no; I will not say "we", but I—I shall be forced to object to requests made by you gentlemen on the Republican side.

It seems to me only a courtesy to permit the Members to express themselves on a particular subject, whether the gentleman from Michigan may agree or not.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman going to discuss the Florida canal?

Mr. MAPES. I am going to try to answer the gentleman's statement, if I can.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DALY, for 2 days, on account of important official business.

To Mr. THURSTON, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. LEE of Oklahoma, for a few days, on account of important business.

To Mr. RICHARDSON (at the request of Mr. WALTER), for 5 days, on account of important official business.

THE MENACE OF FOREIGN IMPORTS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address which I made on Friday, April 17.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include the following radio address I made over a National Broadcasting Co. network, Friday, April 17, 1936:

Two of America's great industries are seriously menaced by competition from abroad. I speak of the threat to our cotton-textile industry through the enormous imports of Japanese low-cost cotton goods and the tannery and leather industry menaced by insufficient tariff protection.

The manufacturers know how serious it is—the workers know it through the bitter experience of lessening demand for their labor. So enormous is the cotton-textile industry that one cannot readily grasp the effect of any harmful influence upon it. It is not a local question, nor a sectional one, it affects not alone the spinner at his loom or the bleacher at his vat; it is of vital importance to the lowliest cotton picker in the fields of the South, and every one of the thousands in that section of the country whose livelihood depends upon the rise and fall in the price of cotton.

It is a foregone conclusion that our mills cannot compete with those of Japan in production costs. Our workers here could not exist on the 24 cents a day paid to cotton spinners there. The only protection we have against these low-cost products is tariff, and the present one has proved insufficient to equalize competition. Bleached cotton cloth is literally pouring into this country from Japan. The figures for the year 1935 show that the volume was 5 times greater than 1934, 117 times more than 1933, and 584 times greater than in 1932. Think of what that means in hours of labor lost to our workers—millions of square yards of cloth brought in from Japan when we have the mills, the workers, and the organization to produce it ourselves. Certainly there is unemployment, and there will be so long as we continue the present short-sighted policy toward foreign competition.

It has been said that we should not protest against these Japanese imports because Japan is our best customer for raw cotton. It is true that great quantities of raw cotton have been exported to that country, but the figures for the month of February 1936 as compared with January of this year are most alarming, showing a decline of 65 percent. Something must be done. The administration and the Democratic Congress seem to view the situation with unconcern. With other Members of Congress I have repeatedly literally begged the State Department to protect the great cotton industry. All we secure are vague promises. This country has lost its cotton goods export trade in Latin America; we have also lost the market in the Philippines. It is true that we have a gentleman's agreement with Japan whereby that country will limit its exports to the Philippine Islands. However, through subterfuge, that agreement is being broken. Cotton goods are being shipped to the Philippines from China, where it is manufactured in mills controlled or owned by the Japanese; also at a production cost which is impossible for us to meet or attempt to meet.

Let us turn away from what is happening to our cotton industry and look at the situation in another of our great industries. From the very beginning of this Nation the cattle and hide industry has ranked as one of the most important. Today there are 393 tanneries operating, which employ 51,000 wage earners, who receive about $58,000,000 a year in wages.

To supply the demand for leather in this country each year 125,000,000 hides are tanned—or, to look at it in another way, one hide for each person in the country. I give you this picture just to show you the importance and magnitude of our tanning industry.

One of the important branches of this trade is the calf-leather industry, which uses in the neighborhood of 30,000,000 calf and cattle skins each year. The calf tanners and workers are in real distress, due to a lack of protective duty. Germany is the menace here, producing calf hides at a low cost, which, coupled with an extremely flexible and varied monetary system, has enabled her to go into the markets and command the business.

Great Britain has seen the danger already, and early in March that nation protected its calf-leather manufacturers with a 30-percent duty. England has always had the reputation of being more of a free-trading country than ours, but when they see the situation demands remedying, they act. What has this administration done about it? Nothing. Germany has turned aside from the English market and is now directing all attention to the United States markets. We can debate for hours about relieving the unemployment situation but that condition will never be remedied or relieved by forcing men out of work through unfair foreign competition.

Perhaps it will be easier to visualize the effect of our weak-kneed protective policy if I tell you that in the year 1935 the increase in imports to this country of calf leather amounted to nine and three-quarter million square feet, valued at more than a million and one-quarter dollars. How badly our country needs the employment the finishing of those nine and three-quarter million square feet of hides would provide.

Our Nation has thrived and grown prosperous under a protective-tariff policy. Every Nation of the world was our customer, glad to buy our products and ready to pay our duties so long as we demanded it. Now we are launched upon a visionary experiment of reciprocal-trade agreements. We are rapidly becoming the laughingstock of the world for permitting other countries to take away from us our foreign trade. Our shores are becoming the common dumping ground for the low-cost merchandise of every producing nation of the world. Last year, 1935, showed an increase in imports into the United States that is alarming. It amounted to $383,000,000 more than the previous year, and a large part of this was in merchandise that we are able to produce ourselves. We have the necessary capital, the machinery and mills, while the workers are begging for the opportunity of earning a day's wage instead of going to the town or city hall each week for relief money.

What can be done about it? We can protest and demand that our workers be protected by equalizing tariffs—stop the dumping of low-cost merchandise which is taking the earnings away from American workmen who will not need relief if they have the protection they have been given in the past. That would solve a part of our economic problem.

Legislation is not necessary to save the two industries I mentioned before. The President has the power, given him by Congress, to take care of an emergency such as this. All we lack is the will to do so. It is a question of policy and policy alone. If the people show the administration that it is their will that our products be protected, there is no doubt that it will be done. Our people want work, not relief; an honest day's toil, not boondoggling.

NATIONAL FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. COPELAND. From the Committee on Commerce, I report back favorably, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, what is known as the omnibus flood-control bill, being the bill (H. R. 8455) authorizing the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 1963) thereon.

Mr. President, there may be Senators who will be moved to suggest amendments to this bill. It will help the committee very much if such amendments shall be presented and printed in order that they may be given consideration. Most of them will have to go to the Board of Army Engineers, and it takes time to get their reports. Likewise, with reference to the declaration of policy, there may be those who feel that it should be modified. The committee will greatly appreciate immediate notice of any ideas Senators may have, because we are going to ask the leader at the earliest moment to allow us to present this bill for consideration.

The bill is very much modified from the form in which it appeared last year. It carries about half as much money. Every project in it has been considered by the appropriate committees of the two Houses and by the Army Engineers. I think I may say, in all truth, that it is a well-worked-out and scientific flood-control measure. It does provide for local contributions. It seemed to a majority of the committee that, inasmuch as benefits involving $350,000,000 are provided by the Federal Government, the States and localities benefited should make a contribution of at least $100,000,000, as provided in the bill. The method of the allocation of the benefits is described in the bill, and I hope the measure may, in the near future, receive the favorable consideration of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be received and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on April 24, 1936, that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

PROPOSED SILVER CONFERENCE

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask consent to introduce a joint resolution and request that it be read and appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution will be received, read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 254) authorizing the President to extend to the governments of America, including the Dominion of Canada, an invitation to attend a silver conference, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized to extend to the governments of America, including the Dominion of Canada, an invitation to attend a conference for the purpose of considering and devising plans to increase the use of silver for monetary and other purposes, to bring about stabilization of the price of silver, and to formulate a uniform policy for such governments with respect to silver.

SEC. 2. The sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is authorized to be appropriated for the expenses of such conference, including salaries in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, rent, printing and binding, printing of official meeting cards, travel and subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), stenographic and other services by contract if deemed necessary, and such other expenses as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of State by reason of such conference.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 499) authorizing and requesting the President to extend to the Government of Sweden and individuals an invitation to join the Government and people of the United States in the observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the first permanent settlement in the Delaware River Valley, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

TRANSFER OF POWDER AND OTHER EXPLOSIVE MATERIALS

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on Friday last, when the calendar was being considered under a unanimous-consent agreement, Senate bill 3646, to repeal an act of March 3, 1933, entitled "An act to provide for the transfer of powder and other explosive materials from deteriorated and unserviceable ammunition under the control of the War Department to the Department of Agriculture for use in land clearing, drainage, road building, and other agricultural purposes", was passed during my temporary absence from the floor. I have consulted with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], and it is entirely agreeable to him that I should ask unanimous consent that the measure be restored to the calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it will be necessary for the Senator to move a reconsideration of the votes by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and passed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I had hoped that I could accomplish the purpose by asking unanimous consent. It is a bill concerning which I had previously spoken to the Senator from Texas, and he did not desire to have it passed in my absence.

Mr. ROBINSON. I take it there will be no objection to the request to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, but I think the Senator from Wisconsin understands that that is a necessary step.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the votes whereby Senate bill 3646 was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed on Friday be reconsidered and that the measure be restored to its place on the calendar.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, no doubt I would have no objection, but what is the nature of the bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is a bill which proposes to repeal the law relating to the disposition of surplus explosives to farmers and others for the purpose of clearing land.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I also inquire of the Senator if he is informed whether the bill is in the possession of the Senate?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is in possession of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none, and the votes by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, are reconsidered, and the bill will be restored to its place on the calendar.

GEORGE LAWLEY & SON CORPORATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 998) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of George Lawley & Son Corporation, of Boston, Mass., which was, on page 1, line 7, to strike out "being" and insert "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States for."

Mr. COOLIDGE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

A. RANDOLPH HOLLADAY

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1110) for the relief of A. Randolph Holladay, which was, on page 1, lines 6 and 7, to strike out "with all interest due thereon, as" and insert "in full settlement of all claims against the United States for."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

WALES ISLAND PACKING CO.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the other day a bill came from the House of Representatives, being the bill (S. 753) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of the Wales Island Packing Co., with the House amendments; and there was a difference of opinion between the House and the Senate as to the percentage which should be paid lawyers. Without knowing what the difference was, I had asked that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and that conferees be appointed. I now ask unanimous consent that the vote whereby the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill were disagreed to and a conference was requested with the House thereon be reconsidered and that the action of the Presiding Officer appointing the conferees on the part of the Senate be rescinded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, what did the bill provide?

Mr. COPELAND. The bill made provision for payment to lawyers or agents, and so forth, of 20 percent. The amendments on the part of the House provided for a reduction to 10 percent.

I now move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

EFFECT OF LONG- AND SHORT-HAUL CLAUSE ON NEW ENGLAND INDUSTRIES

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD an article entitled "Industry in New England and the Effect of the Proposed Repeal of the Long- and Short-Haul Rule", having reference to section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act. The article was prepared by the fourth section committee of the New England Traffic League.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

INDUSTRY IN NEW ENGLAND AND THE EFFECT OF THE PROPOSED REPEAL OF THE LONG- AND SHORT-HAUL RULE—SECTION 4, INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT

SOME REASONS FOR CONTINUING IN FORCE THE PRESENT LAW

Considerable agitation at the behest of various railways for the repeal of the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act (long- and short-haul clause) resulted in the message of the Pettengill bill in the House of Representatives. The bill is now before the Senate for consideration.

It is the view of the New England Traffic League that the long- and short-haul clause of the Interstate Commerce Act should not be repealed. It would be a sad day, indeed, for New England industry if the Senate enacts the Pettengill bill into law.

The New England Traffic League offers the following for your consideration:

THE PRESENT LAW IS SUFFICIENTLY BROAD TO PROTECT THE INTERESTS OF THE SHIPPERS AND THE RAILROADS

Paragraph (1), section 4, of the Interstate Commerce Act, in effect today, contains the following proviso:

"Provided, That upon application to the Commission such common carrier may in special cases, after investigation, be authorized by the Commission to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the Commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section; but in exercising the authority conferred upon it in this proviso the Commission shall not permit the establishment of any charge to or from the more distant point that is not reasonably compensatory for the service performed, and if a circuitous rail line or route is, because of such circuity, granted authority to meet the charges of a more direct line or route to or from competitive points and to maintain higher charges to or from intermediate points on its line, the authority shall not include intermediate points as to which the haul of the petitioning line or route is not longer than that of the direct line or route between the competitive points; and no such authorization shall be granted on account of merely potential water competition not actually in existence."

It can readily be seen that the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the present law, may authorize a carrier to charge less for a longer haul than for a shorter haul over the same route, provided the rates are "reasonably compensatory."

Furthermore, it might be of interest to note that, over a period of 10 years, the Interstate Commerce Commission granted approximately two-thirds of the applications of the carriers for fourth-section relief. Therefore, it must be apparent to all that the law, as it now reads, is no hardship to the railroads nor to the affected shippers.

If the law is repealed, the carriers can publish rates to the more distant points which are not "reasonably compensatory" at the expense of the intermediate points; at the expense of the boat lines; and at the expense of the New England shippers in particular.

GEOGRAPHICALLY NEW ENGLAND SHIPPERS ARE VIRTUALLY OUT ON A LIMB

So far as New England industry is concerned, it must be borne in mind that the New England manufacturers can ship south and west only, while manufacturers in the Central West can ship in all directions. New England is, so to speak, out on a limb when it comes to distribution by rail.

The boat lines have made it possible for the New England manufacturers to reach the South, Southwest, and the Pacific coast at rates which enable them to do business. In fact, the Pacific coast is an important market for New England-made merchandise. However, if the fourth section is repealed, it requires no stretch of the imagination to see that this important market may be taken over by the central western manufacturers.

The transcontinental lines are the prime movers back of the repeal of the fourth section. They wish to publish rates to the Pacific coast territory which will be low enough to divert the traffic now moving via water to the railroads. In the process, manufacturers in New England will lose a large share of the Pacific coast market to the Central West manufacturers because the manufacturers in New England will then be unable to lay down their goods cheaper on the Pacific coast than the central western manufacturers. Low transcontinental freight rates will deprive New England of its geographical advantage of being located on the Atlantic seaboard.

There is just so much business to be had in the Pacific coast territory. New England manufacturers are now getting their share because of the Panama Canal route. New England cannot hope to increase its business in that territory by the repeal of the long- and short-haul clause. On the other hand, the central western manufacturers will no doubt get lower rates from the railroads, which will attract a substantial amount of business at the expense of New England manufacturers. New England now has an advantage which will be taken from it by the enactment of the Pettengill bill.

The foregoing applies with equal force on business enjoyed by New England manufacturers in the South and Southwest.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE WILL BE INJURED

There can be no question that the American merchant marine is an important adjunct to our transportation scheme. In fact, the Federal Government has spent millions of dollars in subsidizing a strong merchant marine on which we can rely in case of war. Yet the advocates of the repeal of the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act completely ignore the fact that if the railroads are allowed to publish unduly low rates to the Pacific coast ports it will be done at the expense of the intercoastal steamship lines. There is no gainsaying the fact that low rates will be published by the transcontinental railroads from the central west to Pacific coast port cities so as to attract business away from New England shippers and the boat lines.

It is true that the railroads are suffering from lack of business and many railroads are in financial straits, but cannot the same be said of our boat lines? Are we going to enact laws which will injure them? We owe as much to our boat lines as we do to our railroads—nothing must be done to injure either. Each has its place in the sun; and if the boat lines can haul the traffic cheaper than the railroads, the boat lines are entitled to the business.

Furthermore, the Interstate Commerce Commission can, under the present law, authorize the railroads to publish lower rates to the Pacific coast ports than apply to intermediate points, provided the rates are "reasonably compensatory for the service performed." If the rates are not compensatory, they are unlawful. Can any law be fairer than that? The only result and purpose of rates that are not compensatory would be to attract business away from the boat lines, and the loss incurred by the railroads for hauling noncompensatory traffic would have to be made up in the rates to intermediate points. Can this be called fair?

The intercoastal lines cannot compete with the railroads to any large extent or area because they are limited to the port cities. On the other hand, the railroads reach all parts of the country. They already have a tremendous advantage over the boat lines, and they also reach the port cities.

I. C. C. DECISIONS TRANSCONTINENTAL CASES

In the Transcontinental cases, 1922, the Interstate Commerce Commission said in part as follows:

"Moreover, in section 500 of the Transportation Act, 1920, is expressly declared the policy of Congress to foster and preserve in full vigor both rail and water transportation.

"We think the amendment was the Congress' way of saying that we should follow a less liberal policy in dealing with departures from the long- and short-haul rule than had been followed in former years."

And in Transcontinental cases of 1926, the following appears:

"The record shows that the total tonnage, both eastbound and westbound, of all water lines (Panama Canal boats) is but a very small fraction of that of the transcontinental carriers operating west of Chicago. It is evident, therefore, that the diversion of any substantial tonnage from the water lines would have but an inappreciable effect on the net revenue of the rail carriers."

On the other hand, the diversion of any substantial tonnage from the water lines might well ruin some of the intercoastal steamship companies. Would that be in the public interest? Obviously it would not, but that may be the result if the fourth section is repealed or revised.

EASTERN RAILROADS WOULD LOSE MUCH TRAFFIC AND REVENUE

It has been said that the purpose of the repeal of the long- and short-haul clause of the Interstate Commerce Act is to enable the railroads to secure more business and revenue. Let us see if this is true so far as the eastern railroads are concerned.

In the first place, it is a known fact that the eastern roads get more revenue for hauling traffic to the intercoastal lines at the eastern ports than they would get out of their divisions of the transcontinental rates. That being true, how will the eastern railroads be helped?

PUBLIC PROTECTION

Under date of March 12, 1934, Commissioner McManamy wrote a letter to Chairman RAYBURN, of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, presenting the recommendations of the Interstate Commerce Commission. He reviewed at some length the history of the fourth section and set forth the judgment of the I. C. C., as follows:

"H. R. 8100 does not propose to leave even a qualified prohibition in the law against maintaining the kind of discriminations prohibited by section 4, but proposes to repeal the prohibition entirely. We are unable to understand how the public interest would be served by enactment of such a bill. Experience has shown during the years before and since the enactment of the act to regulate commerce in 1887 that special measures are necessary to prevent the peculiar form of undue prejudice and discrimination which may be created by the establishment of higher rates for shorter than for longer distances. Section 4 was designed to protect the public against this special kind of prejudice and discrimination. * * *

"We are of the opinion that the record of the carriers with respect to the establishment of higher rates for shorter than for longer distances during the nearly half a century since the enactment of the original act has fully demonstrated the need for further protection of the shipping public against the kind of discrimination and prejudice resulting from the establishment of higher rates for shorter than for longer distances than that afforded generally by those sections of the act other than section 4, and it is our view that the long- and short-haul provision of that section should be continued in force to insure this protection."

JOSEPH B. EASTMAN, COORDINATOR OF TRANSPORTATION, SPEAKS

"So far as water transportation is concerned, you know what happened in the past when the railroads had a free hand and swept the inland waterways practically free of competing craft. In an open fight, without let or hindrance, the advantage lies with the form of transportation which has the largest reserves of traffic upon which other transportation agencies cannot encroach, and with all of the competition by which they are beset, the railroads still have the edge in that respect. In that connection I suggest that you who have the interest of water transportation at heart may well keep an eye on the attempts which are being made to wipe out the long- and short-haul clause of the Interstate Commerce Act (the Pettengill bill). I venture this suggestion lest there be a repetition of our early experience with destructive competition."—Joseph B. Eastman, Federal Railroad Coordinator, before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, Washington, D. C., April 30, 1934.

FEDERAL COORDINATOR'S REPORT TO CONGRESS ON TRANSPORTATION LEGISLATION

There is quoted below what the Coordinator of Transportation had to say regarding the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act in his fourth report on transportation legislation recently released:

CHANGES IN RAILROAD LAW

"With one exception, no occasion has arisen for changing the recommendations heretofore made with respect to amendments to what is now part 1 of the Interstate Commerce Act. The exception relates to the proposed bill to restore the fourth section to the form which it had prior to the legislation of 1920. If this were done, it would remove the following limitations upon the granting of fourth-section relief which were added by the Transportation Act, 1920:

"(a) That the Commission shall not permit the establishment of any charge to or from the more distant point that is not reasonably compensatory for the service performed.

"(b) That if a circuitous rail line or route is, because of such circuity, granted authority to meet the charge of a more direct line or route to or from competitive points and to maintain higher charges to or from intermediate points on its line, the authority shall not include intermediate points as to which the haul of the petitioning line or route is not longer than that of the direct line or route between the competitive points.

"(c) That no such authorization shall be granted on account of potential water competition not actually in existence.

The reasons for such amendment were fully discussed in the second report of the Coordinator (S. Doc. No. 152, 73d Cong., 2d sess.), at pages 66–72. The elimination of (b) was regarded as important, but not the elimination of (a) or (c)."

The reason for eliminating the clause described in (b), which is known as the equidistant clause, is briefly that it has given rise to serious practical difficulties in the administration of the section. In this connection reference may be made to Commodity Rates on Lumber and Other Forest Products (151 I. C. C. 763), which sets forth these difficulties in detail and the differing views which commissioners have entertained as to the interpretation and application of this clause. They have been avoided by a construction of the law which some commissioners believe to be valid and others do not. A sound conclusion is that the clause is unnecessary and undesirable and ought to be eliminated.

The clause described in (c) has caused no difficulties, but embodies a principle which was uniformly followed in the administration of the section before the clause was inserted in 1920. To make it fully applicable to present conditions, the word "water" should be eliminated, so that it may relate to all forms of potential competition.

The elimination of the clause described in (a) was favored on the ground that it was a "provision of indefinite and uncertain meaning" which "adds nothing but controversy" to the section.

However, upon further consideration and in view of the discussion of this matter which has taken place before committees of Congress, it appears that there is danger that the elimination, both of (a) and of (c), might be construed by the courts as evidence of an intent to change the policy heretofore followed by the Commission in the administration of the section. Upon the assumption that the water carriers will be brought under further regulation, the change in the fourth section should be confined to the elimination of the clause described in (b).

THE BURDEN OF JUSTIFYING DEPARTURE FROM THE FOURTH SECTION SHOULD REMAIN ON CARRIERS

It is claimed that from a practical standpoint the Interstate Commerce Commission can control any rate situations that might be brought about by reason of the repeal of the long- and short-haul clause of the fourth section of the act because of its power to prescribe both maximum and minimum rates. We question very much the accuracy of this contention inasmuch as the Commission has stated in a number of its decisions in cases where it was specifically requested to exercise its authority to prescribe minimum rates that "we have said a number of times that this power should be exercised only when necessary in order to avoid substantial public injury (Ex-Lake Iron Ore from Chicago to Granite City, 123 I. C. C. 503, 504)."

Looking at this matter from a purely shipper's view permit us to point out the peculiar situation in which they will be placed should this fundamental protective provision of the fourth section of the act be repealed. Under the present long- and short-haul clause carriers are prohibited from departing therefrom in the publication of rates except when they have obtained permission or relief from the Commission. In connection therewith, shippers have also the right of appearing at any hearing that may be held in such fourth section matters. Repeal the present long- and short-haul clause and what follows? Carriers may publish any rates that they may see fit to publish to gateway or junction points to meet motor-truck competition or even carrier or commercial competition, without the need of applying to the Commission for permission to do so.

There is every possibility that competitive adjustments of rates prescribed by the Commission as between important producing sections will be destroyed if this change is made. The burden of justifying any departures of the long- and short-haul clause of the fourth section of the act is now on the carriers, in the first instance, and it should remain there. Shippers should not willingly assume the burden of protesting against prejudicial changes in rates that will result if this change is made.

NEW DEAL EXPERIMENTS—ADDRESS BY BERNARR MACFADDEN

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address on the subject "Amateurs Gambling with National Prosperity", delivered by Mr. Bernarr Macfadden, publisher of Liberty, before the Harrison County Republican Women's Club, at Clarksburg, W. Va., on April 16, 1936.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMATEURS GAMBLING WITH NATIONAL PROSPERITY

Let us look at the record of the New Deal. Has it helped or hindered the economic progress of our country? It has restricted our progress toward recovery to an unbelievable degree.

The public mind is confused on this issue on the theory that the New Deal administration began on March 4, 1933, when the President was inaugurated. Now, the New Deal program and the New Deal activities as we know them and as Rex Tugwell intended them to be long before President Roosevelt was inaugurated, did not begin until August 1, with the inauguration of the N. R. A., and the actual aims of the New Deal were not realized even in part until after the 1st of September 1933.

There was absolutely no similarity between the attitude of the President toward business or toward the Constitution from March 4 to the time of the introduction of the N. R. A. in comparison with his attitude toward business and American institutions after the introduction of this bureaucratic control. Bear that statement in mind and it will then be possible to fairly and justly judge the New Deal.

Now, let us go back over the early days of the Roosevelt Administration, that we may conclusively prove to any nonpartisan mind that the New Deal system of regimentation and antibusiness activities were entirely unnecessary, that they prolonged human suffering and the other evils associated with unemployment for more than 2 years.

I charge the New Deal with direct responsibility for stopping the greatest surge toward unprecedented prosperity that any country in the world has ever experienced in a period of 150 days. I gladly give President Roosevelt—during that time when he was a Jeffersonian Democrat—full credit for stemming the tide of a disastrous financial panic. Indelible records of historical events from September 1, 1933, to the present time, compel me to accuse President Roosevelt of bringing on a political depression needlessly after he had stopped a financial panic.

To judge President Roosevelt, it is necessary to judge two entirely different political policies—entirely different national policies—prosecuted by one man during the short space of 7 months. In other words, I repeat, to prevent misquotation, that the New Deal was directly responsible for creating a new depression after 5 months of Jeffersonian democracy had ended a panic and brought the entire country into one hard-working cooperative unit.

I will cover the high points of one of the most memorable 5 months in American history and prove my contention by letting the last 33 months of New Deal confusion speak for themselves.

Franklin D. Roosevelt took office in one of the darkest periods in American economic history, an acute situation that developed mainly between the time Roosevelt was elected and inaugurated. The real story of why that acute situation developed, placing every bank in the United States in jeopardy, has never been fully unfolded. It is a dramatic tale and should some day be told.

Now, in the first soul-searing days of the Roosevelt activities the President of the United States followed a Jeffersonian policy and his first act electrified with confidence a fearful and frightened people. When the banks were closed by Executive order the country waited breathlessly for the all-important statement that would herald their reopening. We will always remember how breathlessly the entire Nation waited for the most memorable radio address ever delivered by one man.

Before Mr. Roosevelt began that talk the people of this country were held in the grip of panic; when the President closed his address the financial panic, as such, was over. Finished! The stage was set for a consistent and dramatic return to normal prosperity. And Mr. Roosevelt with Jeffersonian directness courageously placed himself on record. He demanded the immediate balancing of the Budget. He was not content with just talking about it. He secured the reduction of pensions paid to certain classes of soldiers and descendants of soldiers. And that took some courage. Those veterans made a howl that reverberated all over the country. He breathed the spirit of vigorous cooperative effort.

He appealed equally to all factions throughout the Nation. He praised American institutions and called for sacrifices for the common good. He dramatically declared that we had nothing to fear in this country but fear itself—and that soul-stirring statement welded all warring factions of American life together, as though they were drawn by a powerful magnet.

It did more to start a definite return of prosperity than Congress could possibly do with years of its lawmaking.

Yes; those were dramatic days.

All of my publications vigorously supported this new Chief Executive, who had dispelled the clouds of fear and doubt and had brought all groups of American people together on common ground. In those remarkable 150 days the Chief Executive was praised to the housetops because of his absolute fairness to people in all walks of life.

Party lines had faded away. Factional differences of a partisan nature also disappeared. In fact, there were no opposing factions; bankers and businessmen, workers and farmers dropped their antagonism and rose en masse to support the Chief Executive.

We had prayed for a leader and here, apparently, was a mastermind.

It is safe to say that 90 percent of the American people were solidly back of the new administration, and the other 10 percent were refraining from criticism.

But the new President was not talking about regimentation; he was not belittling the Constitution, nor was he casting aspersions on the Supreme Court.

Now let us view the succeeding events. The administration's activity under Jeffersonian democracy between March 4 and the introduction of the N. R. A. proves conclusively that the New Deal policies were never necessary, that they were positively destructive.

Now let us quote a few facts. They are amazingly interesting, because they are supported by irrefutable records.

On March 4, wheat in Chicago was 55 cents a bushel. A little more than 5 months later the price stood at $1.17 a bushel. This, of course, before the A. A. A. came into being, and incidentally let me add that wheat never did reach that price under the A. A. A.

Cotton in New Orleans was $6.39 a hundred pounds when Roosevelt took office. A little more than 5 months later it had advanced to $10.75 a hundredweight, the most dramatic gain recorded in the cotton market in many years.

In the 5 months previous to the introduction of the N. R. A., cotton advanced twice as much as it did in the next 33 months, although hundreds of millions of dollars were poured into the cotton district during the latter period. In other words, the great upturn in cotton came before the New Deal A. A. A. policy and not after.

Now let us view the industrial records during those months, before the New Deal N. R. A. policy come into effect, and compare them with the latter 33 months under the New Deal.

On March 4, 1933, steel production stood at 18 percent of normal. On the 1st of August, after the greatest 5 months' advance in steel history, production stood at 58 percent. New furnaces were opened up and "help wanted" signs were appearing in steel mills all over the country.

But now note how the business barometer acted. The average price of all industrial stocks on March 4, 1933, stood at 40 percent of normal. A little more than 5 months later in a spectacular advance they had reached 83 percent of normal, or in other words, all listed industrial stocks had more than doubled in value. The average of all railroad stocks stood at 39 percent of normal on March 4. They had advanced 86 percent a little more than 5 months later. The average price of public-utility stock stood at 67 percent of normal on the 4th of March. They advanced to more than 100 percent normal by little more than 5 months later. This advancement in price was as close to a miracle as this country has experienced in its entire national life.

Now, suppose we review the unemployment situation between March 4, 1933, and August 15. Previous to the N. R. A., mind you, 3,000,000 men went back to work on private pay rolls. It is doubtful if such a great number of men have returned to work in the same length of time in our national history.

When Roosevelt was elected, unemployment stood at 10,000,000. When he was inaugurated, this figure had increased to 13,000,000. On August 1, 1933, previous to the introduction of the N. R. A., under Jeffersonian principles and policies, unemployment had receded to slightly under 10,000,000.

Yes, we can truly state that the panic was over. The end of the depression was then in sight. Yet the great upswing had not even scratched the surface of the great awaiting market which had accumulated over a period of 3 years.

Under the normal momentum of this great upsurge in prices and employment, every idle man should have returned to work within a year and a half after the President's inauguration.

The stage was set to bring this desired condition into reality. Never before had there been greater cooperation between all factions. Never in our history was there greater cooperation between business, labor, agriculture, and the Government. Probably never in our history did an administration proceed for 5 months totally free of criticism from any direction.

And then the bubble burst. Constitutional government was forgotten. The astounding results of a century and a half of capitalistic democracy was thrown to the winds. And here is what happened.

Almost overnight President Roosevelt turned his back on the governmental policies that gave us nearly half of the wealth of the world and a standard of living for workers far above that furnished by any other nation. He threw aside Thomas Jefferson, Grover Cleveland, and embraced the principles of Rexford Tugwell and Felix Frankfurter.

By the 1st of September everyone knew that the Tugwellian theory of socialization was transplanting the policies of the sound advisers that previously surrounded the President. Men like George Peek, who did not believe in restriction of agriculture but who advocated development of foreign market and protection of farm prices in our local market; Lewis W. Douglas, who had sound ideas on Budget balancing; and James P. Warburg, who had thorough experience in financial circles; and many other advisers were completely ignored; and the socialistic policies of the so-called "brain trust"—Tugwell and Frankfurter—were adopted.

That marked the beginning of the N. R. A. and the New Deal as we know it now—the New Deal that this administration is asking us to support for 4 years more.

On the 1st of August the N. R. A. came into effect, and a lot of violent strikes came with it—Toledo, Minneapolis, the textile strike, and the general strike in San Francisco—they will never be forgotten. Suddenly the entire advance of industrial activity and business confidence stopped as if struck by lightning.

For weeks and months no manufacturer, no employer knew where he stood. Businessmen who had been favorable to the N. R. A. while it was being framed in Congress as a purely temporary and voluntary regulative agency suddenly found that it was not a regulative measure.

Under the influence of the "trust" that some people call "brainless" the N. R. A. immediately became a control body; and the employer, instead of being a cooperator with the Government and the employee, actually became a servant of both the Government and the employee.

This was never intended while the N. R. A. was being rushed through Congress. It was this complete reversal of Government policy that doomed the N. R. A. before it started.

With the principle of N. R. A. changed from voluntary to compulsory the handwriting was on the wall. Businessmen from coast to coast were stunned.

The prosperity advance staggered and stopped.

Businessmen by the thousand, small and large, left their places of business and journeyed to Washington, where they helplessly warmed chairs, waiting to find out what wages they could pay, what work they would be allowed to do, what hours they could operate on, and what effect a hundred and one other rules would have on their business activity.

Never in our history were employers thrown into greater confusion.

And what was the immediate result?

Well, the business surge not only stopped; it went right back downhill at an amazing rate.

In a few months steel operations dropped from 58 percent to 25 percent of normal. Unemployment began to increase before the ink was dry on the N. R. A. proclamation, and before the end of the year a million more men were added to the ranks of the unemployed.

This is what the New Deal did to both commercial activity and public confidence. By winter of 1933 the socialistic angle of the New Deal plan developed in earnest.

The hard-headed principles of Jeffersonian Democracy were completely discarded and the crystal-gazing New Deal philosophers, Tugwell and Frankfurter, began intensive development of their socialistic ideas. They turned Congress into a rubber stamp to pass their various communistic laws.

And the whole American scene was changed.

And here is why it changed.

During the dark days from 1929 to 1933 depositors had lost confidence in banks. The public had lost confidence in business, and, although business had confidence in government, the depression continued so long that there was a definite lack of confidence everywhere. In the first half of 1933 Franklin Roosevelt, as a Jeffersonian Democrat, changed that picture. Depositors regained complete confidence in banks. The public began honest cooperation with business, and business retained complete confidence in government.

In other words, the tremendous advance after Roosevelt's inauguration toward unprecedented prosperity was the result of complete cooperation between business, labor, agriculture, and the Federal Government.

But when the Tugwellian New Deal philosophy struck like a cyclone in August of 1933 that desirable situation changed completely.

Almost overnight business lost its confidence and became thoroughly suspicious of the brain trusting Tugwell-Frankfurter influence in administrative circles. As months went by their fears were found fully justified. Laws were proposed and enacted completely foreign to the policies and principles of both the Republican and Democratic Parties.

The administration changed all of its cooperative attitude toward business and became openly antagonistic.

And this was the first time in the entire history of our country when an administration took sides between great American groups and threw its strength against one specific group.

The country now faced a genuine dilemma. To stop the dangerous increase of unemployment the New Deal was compelled to spend billions of dollars for artificial employment. But it did not decrease unemployment.

But the New Dealers remained blind to facts. They refused to recognize the monthly significance of the unemployment records, and that blindness has caused tremendous unnecessary human suffering.

It has caused a nation to wallow in uncertainty for 33 months which should have been the most active and the most prosperous in our history, and would have been if Franklin Roosevelt had continued after the first 5 months to support the principles of Jeffersonian democracy so clearly advocated in the 1932 platform.

Then like a streak of light from heaven came a break in this endless procession of doubt and fear. With the constant attack on recognized constitutional principles, actual ruin of this country was prevented by the momentous Supreme Court decision on the N. R. A. last year. That decision returned to businessmen their confidence in the Supreme Court branch of their Government. Once more we were a country governed by law—not personal whim.

Not only did the N. R. A. decision put the brakes on the systematic subjugation of American business to bureaucratic tyranny but it served another equally important purpose. It laid the first firm foundation for a steady upturn in stocks and business activity. The President and the members of the Cabinet predicted 35-cent wheat, 6-cent cotton, wages cut to pieces, and the return of chaotic conditions because of the Supreme Court decision. We find after 9 months that wages were not cut, which upset the theory of the administration that Federal control was necessary for the establishment or the maintenance of fair wages.

We find on the other hand that instead of the chaos predicted several great corporations, with confidence in the protection of the Supreme Court against the despotic activities of vindictive demagogues—actually threw millions into plant rehabilitation. They announced the intention of doing so within a month after the electrifying decision was handed down.

From the date of this deathblow to New Deal expansion we have witnessed the first signs of solid business confidence since the N. R. A. was installed, proving conclusively that the upturn we are now enjoying is due to the belief among businessmen that the New Deal sun is setting.

And that decision marked the beginning of the end of the "brain trusters' " dream of sovietizing the United States.

It should have shaken President Roosevelt's confidence in the omnipotence of the Tugwell-Frankfurther dreamers. But it did not. The President has retained these two men, and it is stated has drawn away more and more from sound advisers.

Now, let us make one thing clear. Mr. Roosevelt is President of the United States and is therefore responsible for the official acts of the Tugwell-Frankfurter "brain trusters." We must stop placing blame for unworkable New Deal policies on the hirelings of the administration. It is the President who is responsible, and he cannot escape the burdens of this responsibility.

Now, let us look at the employment record. The New Deal began on August 1, 1933, and on that day there were slightly less than 10,000,000 unemployed. Just 1 year later there were 10,500,000 unemployed. Two years later there were nearly 11,000,000 unemployed, and on the 1st of February 1936—3½ years later—there were more than 12,000,000 unemployed.

In other words, under the New Deal unemployment in the United States has increased by more than 2,000,000.

Can the New Deal be termed successful with such a disastrous record?

When the New Deal policy came into power in August 1933 the administration promised that within a few months everyone would be back to work. We all remember General Johnson's promise to put 5,000,000 unemployed back to work by fall. Which we later learned was just a lot of cheap "baloney." After spending billions of dollars now, 31 months later, there are more than 2,000,000 unemployed than when the New Deal philosophy began to operate. This is in direct contrast to the nearly 3,000,000 men who went back to work while Roosevelt was still a Democrat—when he was trying to carry out the principles of the Democratic platform.

Is it necessary to produce further proof to convince the American people that the New Deal is a failure and a menace?

It has increased unemployment—it has saddled the country with billions of unnecessary debt—it has vastly multiplied the power of the bureaucrats and greatly increased their numbers of appointed satellites.

It has prevented commercial activity that would have created millions of independent happy homes that are now subsisting on an undernourished dole. Can we say that this is the essence of the loudly heralded humanitarianism?

Of course, we must not forget the promise that the forgotten man must be found and helped. Well, the New Dealers found the forgotten man all right, but it was the tax collector they sent after him. Here is how it was done.

In 1929, 68 percent of all taxes paid were collected directly from property owners, business and professional men, while the indirect taxes paid by the forgotten man and the consumer amounted to 31 percent.

In 1935 only 38 percent of the taxes were collected directly from property owners, business and professional men, while the indirect taxes paid by the forgotten man, by everybody who paid rent, or bought merchandise of any kind had jumped to 61 percent.

The indirect tax load on the forgotten man had just doubled, although his burden was supposed to be heavy enough before the new dealer started looking for him.

Now, what is the solution? And how long is it necessary to keep 12,000,000 men idle when we know that there is sufficient work available to put everyone back on the pay roll who wants to work?

And the answer is, Not one day longer than the return of a common-sense relationship between Government and business. And when we say business, we mean employers and employees.

The Government is deluded in its present claim of steadily advancing prosperity. In consumable goods we are very close to normal and have been for 2 years. But in the durable-goods market, which is the generating power for real prosperity, we are no more advanced than we were when the New Deal started in August 1933.

It is the stagnation in the durable-goods market that is holding up the whole prosperity procession.

More than $50,000,000,000 of durable-goods market awaits nothing more than fair dealing between the Government and business. It is now paralyzed by fear.

In this industry 5,000,000 men are idle who were working in 1928. The tremendous accumulated 5-year market will make it necessary to employ between 7,000,000 and 8,000,000 men in this one line for many years to come.

And when this work starts most of the men will receive skilled-labor wages. A million seven hundred thousand men can then go back to work on farms, where they were displaced by the A. A. A., that brilliant New Deal creation which robbed the American farmer of his foreign market, caused the importation of millions of dollars' worth of foodstuffs from foreign shores, and developed millions of acres of new cotton land in Brazil to permanently displace our cotton which we formerly sold in foreign markets.

Whatever the New Deal failed to do for us it has done for Brazil and other foreign countries that profited by the willful destruction of American agricultural products.

Possibly Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Wallace were thinking of the peons in Brazil when they started on the crusade to help the forgotten men.

Let me say without fear of reasonable contradiction that whenever the Government of the United States returns to sound constitutional policy and treats business with the same equality and consideration that it treats labor and agriculture, every man in this country who wants work will be able to find it in a remarkably short time.

The Government invasion of private enterprise, the confiscatory program of taxation, and the Government's senseless antagonism to all business enterprise is the paralyzing power that is today withholding work from 12,000,000 idle men and prosperity for all of our citizens.

The New Deal has turned into a raw deal, and it must be exterminated.

The New Deal in America is a direct outgrowth of the movement in Europe to destroy democracy, seen in the rise of Hitler in Germany, Mussolini in Italy, and Stalin in Russia. It is, therefore, an importation from the garbage cans of the Old World. "Planning" and socialism are the same thing.

We have employed in Washington about 1,200 Socialist amateur professors to govern us. And they are trying to invent an ointment that will take the place of sweat. Twelve hundred monkeys housed in our magnificent buildings in Washington with branches to swing from and typewriters to play with would have done less harm. They have taught us to destroy and to spend as the way to achieve success and power. They have attempted to strike the word thrift from our language. In all the bills introduced, in all the articles written, and the documents issued by these amateurs the word "thrift" has never been used once. The idea has never once been hinted.

The new teacher tells us the way to glory is by way of the poorhouse. We are asked to become a nation of paupers and dependents without self-respect. Waste, destruction, scarcity, and beggary are the new national ideals.

To hell with thrift!

We can grow happy and strong by destroying crops of cotton, corn, and wheat, while men and women go naked for clothes and hungry for bread made of wheat and corn. The greatest crime in the history of humanity was the destruction of our crops and livestock. The next greatest crime in the history of America was robbing of millions of the people to enrich a few farmers. Secretary Wallace has paid to his native State of Iowa $72,804,000 to kill their hogs and cattle and stop raising them. This brilliant thing was done in order to mark up the price of bacon, pork, ham, sausage, and steak to be paid by the poor housewives of the rest of our country. Before this we paid 12 cents a pound for pork. Now we pay 24 cents. Abundance is a misfortune.

When the real story of the crimes committed by these silly experimenters is told it will stagger the world. Enormous sums were paid to rich farmers for not raising hogs, for not raising corn, for not raising wheat. It has been revealed in the partial investigation conducted that one wealthy farmer got, in 2 years, for not raising hogs the enormous sum of $219,825—a fortune out of your pockets and mine for doing nothing. Another rich farmer was paid $168,000 out of our tax money for not raising hogs. A rich southern cotton planter was paid $168,000 for not planting cotton, and a farmer in Kansas $78,638 for leaving his land idle. The records show that three farmers got $466,463 for doing nothing. It is surely no wonder that we have not balanced the Budget, but are plunging daily deeper and deeper in debt.

For years our soap-box Socialist orators have been shouting: "Four percent of the people own 87 percent of our wealth." This dangerous and utterly vicious lie has been repeated until millions of people believe it, and it has now been adopted as a fact by our present administration. What are the facts?

In the lowest year of our recent history the total wealth of the Nation was two hundred and forty-seven billions. Eighty-seven percent of that would be two hundred and fourteen billions owned by 4 percent of the people. This would leave but thirty-two billions for the remaining 96 percent of population, according to the Socialist orator.

Statistics show that we have 10,000,000 families who own urban homes worth thirty-eight billions. Six million farmers whose lands are worth forty-three billions. Eight million building and loan shareholders own eight billions in assets. Twenty million automobile owners hold cars worth eight billions. Twenty-four million security holders own stocks and bonds valued at seventy-six billions. Sixty-three million people hold life-insurance policies worth eighteen billions. Forty-four million people have savings-bank deposits worth twenty-four billions. A total of $215,000,000,000 worth of property in the hands of 91 percent of the total adult population.

Our national annual income is placed at 82 billions. Employees receive 67 billions of this and capital but 15 billions.

If we should soak the rich and confiscate all incomes over $150,000 a year and distribute it, each one of us would get the magnificent sum of 23 cents a month for 1 year—and nothing thereafter. If we should confiscate every dollar of income above the modest sum of $5,000 and distribute it, we would each of us get $2.32 a month for 1 year—and nothing thereafter.

The simple truth is that we have the widest distribution of wealth and the highest standard of living for the masses of any nation of the world in this age or any other of human history.

Make no mistake about it. Central control excludes individual liberty. There is no middle ground. We can have a free country or a Socialist-controlled state. We cannot have both. Our system cannot be half free and half socialistic any more than it could be half slave and half free.

There can be no compromise on the issue. This country is a democracy, and governmental regimentation has no place in it. If there is any stability and self-sacrifice in the Republican Party, the New Deal nightmare will end on November 3, 1936.

AGRICULTURAL POLICY AND GOVERNMENTAL EXPENDITURES—ADDRESS BY SENATOR CAPPER

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] on the subject of a national agricultural policy and a reduction in governmental expenditures.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Friends in the Grange and friends of the Grange, it always is a pleasure to talk to the Grange. One feels at home with the Grange. I have been a member of the Grange for close to two decades. I have been an admirer of the Grange and the Grange policies, both agricultural and general policies, for nearly half a century. I regard the Grange as the balance wheel among the several great farm organizations. Grange leadership for a half century has been forward looking, but at the same time it has not rushed out so far in front of the march of progress as to lose its connection with things as they actually are. The Grange has a habit of finding facts. It has the habit of facing realities. So I do not feel it necessary in speaking to a Grange audience to indulge in many preliminary words of introduction. I shall try to get right down to what I have to say and say it as briefly and concisely as possible.

I propose to discuss just two subjects in the few minutes we have together today. First, the need of a sound national agricultural policy based on things as they are, not based on political expediency. The farm problem is an economic problem, not a partisan political problem. It is a crime to make the farm issue the football of politics. Second, the almost equally crying need for a reduction in governmental expenditures. I want to commend the Grange for its consistent and continued opposition to extravagant and unnecessary expenditure of the public tax money.

It is not necessary in talking to the Grange to indulge in figures of speech nor to tell any funny stories. One can confine himself to facts; one is safe in using such figures as tell those facts. It is not necessary to tell the Grange that there are some 6,800,000 farms in the United States, with a total value of nearly 33,000 million dollars. There are also almost 33,000,000 men, women, and children living on these farms engaged in earning their livelihood.

SHRINKAGE IN FARM VALUES

In 1920 the average farm was valued at $12,000; in 1930 it was valued at $9,000; in 1935 it was valued at $4,480. We hear a lot of talk about a balanced Budget. A balanced Budget for agriculture in the United States would mean an annual farm income of more than $13,000,000,000. Instead, we find it is still under $8,000,000,000, even including Government benefit payments. The World War brought about dislocations in foreign trade and changed the status of the United States from a debtor to a creditor Nation. We need a foreign market for American farm products. Any program adopted must have that objective in view. But we may as well face the fact that a large foreign market is not open to us in the immediate future.

Unless and until we regain a substantial part of our foreign markets, the American farmer must figure on getting the bulk of his income from the American market. I want to emphasize one point right now. No farmer, no friend of agriculture, no American with an American viewpoint, can afford to forget it for a minute. The American farmer is entitled to the American market for his products. No administration, no political party, no farm leader, no national leader, has any business, nor any right, through trade agreements or any other policy, to trade off the American market to farmers of any other nation. American agriculture today faces a restricted market for its products. That restricted market, except for cotton and a few minor crops, is the United States of America.

I have felt for years, and still feel, that American agriculture receives an inadequate income. That inadequate income means that the American farmer does not have the purchasing power necessary to keep industry going, to furnish jobs for American labor. Now, what can be done about it?

LONG-TIME AGRICULTURAL PROGRAM

First, the long-time program must include—probably should be based upon—conservation of our most valuable national resource, the soil itself. That will require a national land-utilization policy, such as was advocated by the Republican National Convention in its 1932 platform. Second, there is necessary some means of adjusting supply of agricultural commodities to the market demand for these commodities. As the matter stands today it is not possible for the American farmer to sell enough of his products at world price levels to overcome the discrepancy between the world price level and the domestic price level. That means, if and when he attempts to increase his income by increasing his production beyond domestic market demands, he produces surpluses. The law of supply and demand works unfailingly. A surplus production means a lower price; the larger the surplus, the lower the price. The domestic price drops to the world level. That helps force the world price level still lower; this lowered world price again is reflected in the domestic price level. You cannot escape the law of supply and demand.

In addition to the soil-conservation and soil-erosion control program, and in addition to such adjustment of production to consumption as may be incidental to this program, there are at least four other major steps which I consider necessary to a prosperous agriculture. I will state these briefly:

First, the American farmer is entitled to and must be guaranteed the American market. For most commodities not on a recurring annual surplus basis this can be effected through the protective tariff system, which I believe can be made effective for agriculture. Second, tariff equivalent payments—subsidies, if we wish to call them that—should be made to producers of at least four basic commodities—wheat, cotton, hogs, and tobacco. These payments should be based on the percentage of the total production required for domestic needs. Third, provision must be made, through Government aid, for disposing of these surpluses in foreign markets and stabilizing the domestic markets. One way of accomplishing this is through cooperative marketing associations, with Federal backing. Another is through well-organized programs for utilizing the foreign exchange created through our purchases of agricultural commodities not economically produced in this country, such as coffee, rubber, sugar, and so forth. The exchange so created, properly handled, could be used to help dispose of our own agricultural surpluses in foreign markets. Fourth, there must be more adequate financing of agriculture at lower interest rates. I believe the farmer is entitled to an interest rate of 3 percent on Federal farm loans. This is not only necessary for agriculture but it will go a long way toward promoting the general welfare.

TIME TO FACE THE FACTS

Now my friends, I believe the time has come to get down on brass tacks in looking at the fiscal picture of the Government of the United States. One cannot do that without using figures and stating facts. That is what I propose to do in the next few minutes. You may not consider facts and figures interesting, but I assure you that you have a great and real interest in them just the same, because these facts and figures deal with taxes. You pay the taxes. If you are well-to-do, a large part of your income goes to the Federal income by the direct-tax route—income and inheritance taxes. If you are poor, a still larger proportion of your wages and other income goes to the Federal Government through indirect taxes—on things you have to buy to live. If you are neither rich nor poor, but are in what is known as the great middle class, you pay both direct and indirect taxes. I recently saw it stated this way: The Jones family, total income $3,000 a year, pays some $23 a year direct Federal taxes, and more than $50 a year indirect Federal taxes. Last year some 20 percent—that is, one-fifth—of the total national income went to taxes—Federal, State, and local. You may not find the figures interesting, but you have a most decided interest in them just the same.

Now, let's see if we can get the Federal Budget problem reduced to simple language. In the years just preceding the World War, the Federal Government cost about $700,000,000 a year—just under three-quarters of a billion dollars. It is interesting to note that even in those days the bulk of the Federal revenue went to the Army, the Navy, and for pensions—payments for past and future wars. The expenditures for war purposes have been too great. The cost of running the civil Government was around $200,000,000 a year.

Came the World War. Expenditures shot skyward. We spent 18,000 million dollars in just 1 year of that war. We levied new income and profit taxes, which brought in from three to four billion dollars a year. New internal taxes raised another billion dollars a year. The Federal deficit went from zero to 9 billions, then to 13 billions for a year. We met that deficit by borrowing. At the end of the World War, the Federal public debt was just under 26 billion—26,000 million dollars. That 26 billions looked pretty large in 1920. It does not look so large now, when we face a public debt of 36 billions or more by the end of the next fiscal year.

Now, let's see what happened in the decade succeeding the end of the war. In the first place, instead of raising around $700,000,000 a year, the Federal Government in the post-war decade raised around $4,000,000,000 a year. But the running expenses of the Federal Government were only $3,500,000,000 a year. Five times as much as before the war, to be sure. But still $500,000,000 less than receipts. Uncle Sam had a budgetary surplus of one-half billion dollars a year. That $500,000,000 a year surplus was used to reduce the public debt. By 1930 the public debt had been cut from $26,000,000,000 to $16,000,000,000, a reduction of more than one-third.

STAGGERING PROPORTIONS OF PUBLIC DEBT

By the end of the fiscal year 1933—that is June 30, 1933—revenues were down to $2,000,000,000, or $3,000,000,000 less than was expended. The public debt had increased to $22,500,000,000, or $179 per capita. The Federal Government spent $5,143,000,000 in the fiscal year 1933, the last year of President Hoover. During the present fiscal year the Government will spend more than $8,000,000,000.

On June 30, 1935, the public debt was $22,538,000,000. The deficit for that fiscal year was $3,063,000,000. For the present fiscal year the deficit will be upward of $4,000,000,000. Next June 30 the public debt will be upward of $36,000,000,000. We cannot say exactly what will happen the next fiscal year, but we do know that the deficit will be again upward of $4,000,000,000, and the public debt will be greater than $36,000,000,000 by June 30, 1937.

That is a public debt per capita of $282, compared to $131 in 1930, or about $1,350 per family, as against $600 per family in 1930. Where does all this money go? Well, the regular civil government cost is about $700,000,000 a year.

Paying for past and future wars is costing $2,500,000,000 a year. This includes Army, Navy, veterans. We are spending too much for big battleships and military establishments. This year's appropriations for that purpose break all peacetime records!

GOVERNMENTAL MACHINE BECOMES UNWIELDY

We have added a great many new bureaus and commissions. We have added 265,000 people to the Government pay roll in the last 3 years. Thousands of these are not needed.

Now, who is going to pay all this money? You and I, and our children and their children. Every one of us is going to pay his share.

My friends, that is something to think about. I say no country can continually go into the hole at the rate of 3,500 million to upward of 4,000 million dollars a year without facing ultimate bankruptcy.

I say to you, the Federal Government must stop spending that extra $4,000,000,000 a year and must stop it right soon. We cannot go on spending $2 for every dollar we take in.

How are we going to cut down these expenditures? Only through the cooperation of the White House, Congress, and the people of the country. We cannot depend upon the spending agencies to cut down expenditures; they will naturally spend what they can get. The people themselves will have to force the reductions in expenditures. It is your job. It is my job. You can see for yourself it is a big job.

And it is a job that will have to be done. I intend to do my part to see that the job is done in a way that will meet with the approval of the Grange and the other farm groups of the country.

UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES—ADDRESS BY SENATOR LOGAN

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an able and interesting address delivered by the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] to the Alexander Forum at New York City on the 26th instant. In the address the Senator from Kentucky discussed the so-called Robinson bill to prevent unfair trade practices.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Let me say at the outset that I have no interest in the legislation now pending in Congress to prevent price discrimination other than to favor such legislation as will be for the best interest of those affected by the legislation. Any legislation may benefit some persons and adversely affect others, and in the consideration of such legislation the old rule of "the greatest good to the greatest number" should prevail. As citizens of this Republic for generations we adhered to the laissez faire doctrine, but if that doctrine is followed to its logical conclusion it reaches the point where affairs are settled on the old rule that he shall get who has the power and he shall keep who can. Liberty of the individual should not be restricted more than is necessary to prevent his doing harm to the body politic.

It was on October 15, 1914, that the law known as the Clayton Antitrust Act became a statute of the United States. The purpose of the act was to make it unlawful for any person engaged in commerce in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities where such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce. The act, however, contained a proviso that nothing in the act should prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that made only due allowance for difference in cost of selling or transportation, or where a discrimination in price was necessary to meet competition in the same or different communities.

The Robinson-Patman bill is an amendment to the Clayton Act. That the Clayton Act should be amended seems to be conceded by all who are familiar with the purposes of that act. A number of bills have been introduced in the Congress, in the Senate and the House, proposing amendments, but an examination of all of those bills has convinced me that the Robinson bill as reported to the Senate more nearly accomplishes the purposes intended than any other. There are provisions in the Utterback bill reported to the House with which I do not agree. The fact is that I am afraid that the Utterback bill adds little of importance to the Clayton Act as it now stands, but it may be a step in the right direction, although a rather short step.

The bill which I favor is the Robinson bill as reported to the Senate. Its provisions have been misunderstood, misinterpreted, and their meaning perverted by those who perhaps oppose any legislation on the subject. Those who oppose any legislation on the subject are men of ability and experts in their line, and they have pursued the well-known strategy in attempting to divide those who favor such legislation into hostile camps, and have largely succeeded in doing so.

It is my judgment that if the Congress should be made to understand the simple provisions of the Robinson bill there would be little, if any, opposition to it. The special pleader, however, has been able, by presenting technical arguments based on a false premise, to confuse many Members of the Congress. It is a favorite practice of those who oppose legislation to set up a strawman and then demolish him to their own delight. Letters, telegrams, pamphlets, briefs, and oral statements attacking the bill have been made at provisions that are not found in the bill, or else aimed at the provisions of the Clayton Act which has been in existence for 22 years. Because of the falsity of the statements that have been so made, many of them in good faith, because of efforts that have been made to mislead, I shall take this occasion to state simply the provisions and purposes of the Robinson bill.

It has been found that the provisions of the Clayton Act may be easily evaded, and that it has been evaded, and that it is not effective to prevent the evils that it was intended to remedy when it was enacted. It would not be possible to answer arguments that have been advanced against imaginary provisions of the bill. I can only address myself to the bill itself as I understand it.

It is well known that the Clayton Act has been violated in spirit by the practice of certain large buyers who demand the allowance of brokerage direct to them upon their purchases, or its payment to an employee, agent, or corporate subsidiary set up by such buyers in the guise of a broker and through whom they demand that the sales to them be made. To allow payment or allowance under the guise of brokerage when no service is rendered permits the evasion of the provisions of the Clayton Act. The Robinson bill prohibits discrimination in the nature, or under the guise of brokerage, where it is but a subterfuge and is intended only as a rebate to the buyer. That is one of the chief points in the Robinson bill. It does not interfere, either directly or indirectly, with legitimate brokerage. A broker employed by the buyer in good faith to find a source of supply, or by the seller to find a market is legitimate and the broker so employed discharges a sound economic function and is entitled to appropriate compensation by the one in whose interest he serves. The Robinson bill does not interfere with his legitimate function. To permit a payment, or allowance, to a dummy broker where no service has been rendered should not be allowed, as it is only a means of price discrimination, and the Robinson bill attempts, through this amendment to the Clayton Act, to do what the Congress intended to do in the first place.

Another means of evading the Clayton Act was what may be described as fraudulent service allowances. Customers with large purchasing power demand of the sellers, and the sellers grant, special allowances in purported payment of advertising and other sales promotional service which the customer agrees to render with reference to the commodity which he secures from the seller, or at other times with reference to his business generally. Service allowances are legitimate if legally used and made for a legitimate purpose.

The Robinson bill does not interfere with legitimate service allowances, but such an allowance becomes unjust and is a means of price discrimination when the service is not rendered as agreed and paid for, or if rendered the payment is grossly in excess of its value, or where the customer is deriving benefits to his own business and is thus enabled to shift to the seller substantial portions of his own advertising cost while the smaller competitor who cannot command such allowances must bear the burden himself. The Robinson bill, as I have said, recognizes that service allowances are legitimate, but it attempts to remedy the evil that has grown up of using service allowances to bring about price discrimination. The Robinson bill does nothing more than to provide that such service allowances shall be reasonable and fair, and that they shall be extended to all alike in proportion to the amount of the purchase, and that when made they shall be made for the legitimate purpose intended, and that the purchaser may not under the guise of such allowance promote his business in other lines thus shifting a part of the cost of conducting his business to the seller. If the language of the Robinson bill interferes in any way with service allowance made in good faith, I cannot find the language, or I fail to understand it. The service allowance by the provisions of the Robinson bill must be made to all purchasers on proportionately equal terms.

The third point in the Robinson bill is the provision regulating quantity discounts or rebates. The bill allows discriminations in price between, or among, purchasers belonging to the same group. A certain discount may be allowed to the purchaser who buys for resale, to wholesalers, to retailers, or to consumers, or for use in further manufacture, but the same discount shall be allowed to each purchaser within the particular group within the limits prescribed by the act. Differentials may be allowed which make only due allowance for differences in the cost, other than brokerage, of manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from the different methods or quantities in which such commodities are to such purchasers sold or delivered. This provision is broad enough to allow every differential that is just. Efficiency is taken care of as it is reflected in the cost. Quantity differentials are allowed, as they should be. If one concern is efficient and produces its goods at a less cost than another, that is a proper basis for differences in price, or delivery resulting from the differing methods or quantities in which such commodities are sold may form a just basis for a differential in price as among purchasers. I do not believe that anyone will contend that a seller should be allowed to sell his goods at less than cost. Eventually such a practice would result in bankruptcy to the seller, as well as to many others engaged in the same line of business. There is nothing, however, in the Robinson bill which prevents discounts in any amount, so long as the same discounts are extended to all customers in the same class. If it costs more to manufacture and deliver goods to one customer than it does to another customer, there may be a difference in price as between the two particular customers.

There is nothing in the bill that prevents discounts based upon quantity; but since such discounts may be abused and the customer of large purchasing power may, by reason of his ability to buy in large quantities, get an advantage that ought not to be allowed, the Robinson bill contains a provision that the Federal Trade Commission may fix and establish quantity limits as to particular commodities, or class of commodities, where it finds that available purchasers in greater quantities are so few as to render differentials on account thereof unjustly discriminatory, or promotive of monopoly in any line of commerce. This is a wise provision. There should be some regulation of quantity discounts if such discounts tend to promote a monopoly. After all, it is antimonopoly legislation.

Another provision in the Robinson bill is the fixing of measure of damages of any who may have been damaged by reason of the violation of the provisions of the act. Instead of providing penalties and fines for a violation of the law, a measure of damage is set up, and the person claiming that he has been damaged by reason of forbidden discrimination or allowance found to have been granted is authorized to go into a court and establish his case if he can. No one may reasonably object to such a provision. There should be no wrong without a remedy, and the individual who has been wronged is entitled to the remedy. If his business has been hurt, or he has suffered a loss because he has not been treated the same as other purchasers in his group, he should have just compensation, and this will do more to bring about the enforcement of the law than any fine that might be imposed.

Congressman CELLER, the distinguished gentleman who opposes the Robinson bill, or rather what he calls, in his minority report to the House, the Utterback-Robinson bill, has expressed well his views in the minority report which he has filed. He is entitled to his views on the subject. I think without any good reason therefor he assumes that if the bill should be enacted it will throttle efficiency and increase production and distribution cost, and if that should result it would raise prices to the consumer. There is nothing in the Robinson bill that would have any such effect. There is nothing in it that affects production or distribution methods.

When it is contended that the Robinson bill would increase the price to consumers I must point out that the effect of the bill might be to reduce the price to consumers instead of to increase it. Roughly speaking, the buyers, known as the chains, sell about 20 percent of the commodities consumed in the entire Nation. There is no reason at all why their prices should be increased if the Robinson bill should be enacted, but if the independents are treated on proportionately equal terms with the large buyers it may well be argued that the price to 80 percent of the consumers would be reduced. Even the most hypercritical view of the Robinson bill cannot lead to the conclusion that there is any justification for the contention that the price to the consumer will be increased. Representative CELLER, in his minority report, presents many arguments against the bill aimed at provisions that are not found in the bill and are not subject to the construction which he has placed upon the language in the bill.

The bill reserves full freedom of the seller to make differentials by reason of any savings in cost, whether operating or overhead, that can be identified as between different customers or classes of customers. This is as far as the bill may go, and it is as far as it does go. Differences in cost must be identified and cannot be left to speculation. Otherwise the provision would be evaded. The bill imposes no restraint upon the use of economy and efficiency either in production or distribution.

I know that it is argued by the distributors, as well as by sellers and buyers, that it would be impossible to identify the cost that should be apportioned to any particular transaction. Such an argument is ridiculous in the extreme. No businessman could long remain in business if he did not know whether he was selling above or below cost, or if he did not know what it cost him to produce and distribute his goods. Such an argument cannot be made in good faith as it is contrary to common every-day experience in all business lines for a businessman to say that he cannot ascertain his cost of production and distribution. The difficulty with the argument of Representative CELLER is that he misconstrues the plain language of the bill itself. There is not a provision in the bill that would allow price fixing.

There is nothing in the bill that, in any way, need interfere with the seller or the buyer who has no desire to satisfy greed or selfishness. The bill does not attempt to put the business or manufacturers and the process of distribution into a strait jacket. It does not regulate manufacturing or distribution. It prohibits certain things which are illegal, unfair, and result in inequitable price discriminations. There is nothing to prevent selling to the larger buyer at a less price than to the smaller buyer. The minority report submitted by Representative CELLER, in commenting on the power of the Federal Trade Commission under the Robinson bill, wholly misconceives the purpose of that provision; and I believe, upon further consideration, he will withdraw his statement in regard thereto. The Utterback bill contains no such provision, and in that it is defective.

The Federal Trade Commission is not given power to establish price-differential limits. It is only given the power to fix quantity limits. Let me further say that the provision of the bill has no relation whatever to the National Recovery Act declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. It may be that one of the defects in that act was to allow a tendency toward monopoly. While the Robinson bill is to prevent that tendency.

The attack made on the constitutional soundness of that provision of the bill which extends to discrimination for or against intrastate customers to the prejudice or advantage of interstate customers, in my judgment, is without any foundation under the decisions of the Supreme Court. If a practice toward a customer in one State affects another customer of the same seller in another State that undoubtedly would constitute a direct burden on interstate commerce.

Businessmen are often short-sighted and the same may be said of our statesmen of the past. We reach out for the advantages immediately before us without looking down the aisle of time to determine the effect of our present actions. If present-day business practices are tending to drive out of business the smaller-business man doing a vast majority of all the business of the Nation along certain lines the time would eventually come when those controlling large purchasing power will have a complete monopoly on the things necessary for existence. When that day shall come we have no reason to believe that the consuming public will be the object of the fratenal care of those who have control of business. It is to prevent the coming of that day that such legislation as is proposed in the Robinson bill is necessary. No one can stand in the way of progress. Old conditions must change and new conditions arise, but new conditions must not be allowed to control the affairs of the country unrestrained by laws fixing the channels and directing the course of such new conditions.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR THOMAS OF UTAH TO AMERICAN SOCIETY OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, at the Thirtieth Annual Meeting of the American Society of International Law held in Washington, April 23 to 25, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] was elected to the vice presidency of the society to fill a vacancy which was caused by the death of the Honorable George W. Wickersham.

At the annual banquet of the society on April 25, the Senator from Utah delivered an address entitled "After 30 Years." I ask unanimous consent to have this address inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Nineteen hundred years before a wise man with a telescope showed that the universe was not made to serve the earth, and twenty-three hundred years before modern thought and science put man relatively in his place, a feast was given attended by men who loved thought and letters, the description of which now has a place in the literature of the world. Said one of those present: "Is not God great and is not nature grand, for here we have wild fowl, fish, and the beasts of the field all slain that we might enjoy them, servants and slaves to serve us? Truly Heaven remembers us, and nature is kind to provide its abundance." To this, though, a young man present replied: "Because man has servants and slaves, and because man is favored above the animals and has the flesh of fowl, beast, and fish to eat is not proof that God created them for man. If you praise God for his foresight in providing for you the good things of nature, then gnats, fleas, and mosquitoes may praise God for creating man for them, because they live on man. It is not well for man to think that he lives on other creatures, better for him to think that he lives with other creatures and that all get life from the same source, Mother Nature herself." The prepositions "on" and "with" are common little service words, but the difference in the thought which they render is a difference of two cultures as wide as continents separated by an ocean. Internationally our problem is age old. Shall nations today live on other nations or shall they live with other nations?

The feast described above took place about the same time that logic was invented. The theory advanced was not the first reasoning in accordance with modern social thought, because a century and a half earlier the social aspect of the moral and religious commandment, "Thou shalt not kill", was given to the world by the great teacher who based his entire thought on nature instead of on revelation, and who made morals a matter of mutual relationship between men rather than the result of a command. It was he who taught his followers to "kill not the ox, for the ox is man's associate in the labor of the field."

It is in the realm of ideas that I trust we may keep our thoughts tonight. From the beginning of that time when people acted in groups almost to the very present, nations and peoples have never questioned the right to live on other nations and peoples. The theories of self-control and self-restraint when applied to nations, still by no means universally accepted, are not much older, as an expression of international right, than half of the past 30 years.

The outstanding phase in the realm of the evolution of ideas is the one which clusters about a notion of extending law to places where there had not been law before. At no time in the entire world have we had a law that spoke for all the world. The ancient theories about law in both the East and the West developed a concept which was called the law of nature and which was assumed to be universal. The second century anno Domini saw the civilized parts of Europe and Asia administered from two centers represented by the great Han dynasty in China and the Roman Empire in the west. The Petrine theory of the church and the universal theory of the holy Roman Empire aimed at unity, but never were the facts of unity further from attainment. A telling restraint was impossible even in ordinary affairs. America was known only to those who lived here.

Today, politically speaking, there is no central authority. We speak of a world court, but even if its jurisdiction were world-wide, its judgment against a state could be enforced only when that state accepted the judgment. There is a society of nations extensive in scope, but that society exists not for itself but for the benefit of its individual members. It itself cannot legislate, it itself cannot enforce. It can only discuss and recommend. If it is thought of as a unity its parts act merely out of a sense of duty to an ideal of national behavior and not from force either implied or actual. States are the only members of this society. Persons do not belong to it. There are no citizens of the League of Nations. In its constitution there is no place for a theory concerning citizenship as we have it in the fourteenth amendment of our Constitution. These simple facts the thoughtless overlook.

Throughout history, when men and rulers gave lip service to a universal rule, the titles of kings and emperors reflected an unquestioned authority wherever the name of the king or the emperor could be thundered. But there was no unity. Today when the concept of real unity is heard only in a prayer to a universal or an eternal God, and all States stand in theory equal to all others, we have more actual unity than the world has ever seen before. It is the irony of history that when the fact of universal authority was asserted, the world had no united will, and that now when the fact is denied, sovereign States show restraint and give at times assent to a united purpose. In this we may have the key to a better world. From this we may learn that the bonds of steel and the bonds of force are as weak as the threads of a spider when compared to the bonds of sentiment. Where, then, shall effective international morality rest? Shall it rest on the strength of steel, on the forced contract, on the might of powder and shell? History has but one answer—strength, when asserted, has destroyed itself.

Institutional evolution in the past 30 years has developed the ability to destroy on a wide scale quite as much as the ability to preserve on a wide scale. But even in this there is food for thought. War has attained a possible mightiness which causes us to say that no longer do men fight men and armies fight armies, but whole peoples fight peoples. The aim to destroy, therefore, is so large that nothing is exempt. Modern war justifies the killing of the babe in the cradle because he is a potential soldier, and the destruction of all property because it may lend indirect assistance. In future war the individual will lose all rights and private property all security. Even in our country in the last war we became so logical in the administration of the Draft Act that persons were denied the right to volunteer for service as soldiers.

My point may be illustrated by studying the theory of proposed laws to cover future wars. But the best illustrations are the actual ones bound in such illegal war as Chapel and the present military ventures in Africa. Therefore we drop bombs from the sky on anything and everything and we would sink and poison en masse regardless of time and place. Under such circumstances, what is happening to the man who is made part of this destruction? Does it take a heroic man to drop bombs on a defenseless village? The element of courage is about as lacking as it would be in the man who has the stamina deliberately to run an express train over a child who happens to be playing on the tracks. When the chief job of a Roman legionnaire became that of attendant at crucifixions Roman soldier esprit de corps became nil, and a soldier's life lost its glamour. Strength always destroys itself. I do not wish to cast any sort of reflection. I know the thrill of a uniform, and to me a nation in arms fighting a righteous cause is still a glorious page of history, but we must note what is actually happening.

For years armies and navies have done less fighting than anything else. The political and economic necessity of a great army in most military lands today is more important than its defensive or offensive necessity. This may be worthy of thought: Think back the history of navies since steel and iron ships were invented. During our Civil War about 600 vessels were under hostile fire. Since the Civil War to date we have used some 700 ships of iron or steel construction, 176 have seen action, but only 3 out of 700 have been destroyed. Even in the Great War there was such a preponderance of allied navy that most of our stronger units were kept on this side of the Atlantic. One reason for this was the shortage of cargo tonnage, which made the problem of supply for great ships across the ocean important. These are facts of history. Their significance is known to those who know that life is merely a process of change and history merely an explanation of that change. Armies and navies are justified and are justifying themselves more and more by services other than mere offense and defense. When in the process of change their purposes become spent they will fall of their own weight. Of course few are willing to wait for the processes of history, and happily this is so, but the gods give to but a very few the blessing of making great history. Generally history makes the great man.

It is, then, to the realm of the idea that we must turn to find encouragement. In our changing attitudes we shall find them justified as they have been justified in the past by our building concepts for political, social, economic, and national action upon accepted theories concerning physical law. In illustrating this point I shall not take you back to the ancient world. I shall stay in modern times. In the days when Newton's theory dominated thought about the physical world, political and national well-being, we assumed, rested upon the theory of balance. Our Constitution reflects Newton. Our liberty was to be maintained on a balance power in government. It was assumed that the forces in government were in constant opposition. The laws relating to the push and the pull in nature were transplanted and thought of as being fundamental, and they actually did dominate man in his thoughts about himself and other men.

When the Darwinian theory became the controlling thought, men beheld themselves and judged mankind a growing organism, or they saw man himself as an evolving animal. From this observation came the theory of change which brought about the acceptance of war on the basis of the survival of the fittest, or which supported the concept of peace on the basis of cooperation and mutual aid. The Darwinian theory lent itself to two opposing attitudes, one that we win by combat, the other that we go forward by mutual endeavor.

Today, very much more than anyone is conscious of it, we find our governing concepts based upon ideas which always reflect a relative association. Our fundamental thought is probably based on Einstein. We are faced with a present deduction that all things are relative and that the absolute is gone. Sovereignty is a relative proposition. National independence of action, like the freedom of the individual, has varying bounds and restraints. Perfection will be attainable but never attained. This brings us, of course, to the human social philosophy of the relative good—not the highest good as an absolute, but the best good as an objective. There is some hope for a better world if we can bring about the universal acceptance of these attitudes for both men and nations.

We must break down the absolutes if good will is to reign in the earth. An absolute in an international clash justifies us in killing a man because he is a Frenchman, or because he is an Italian, or because he is an Englishman! That is an indictment of civilized thinking, and properly such reasoning is being tempered by a changing attitude. Still we are in the midst of a struggle to overcome this thought. Just as we had assumed that the great victory for individual man had been won when the law of citizenship was made to rest on place of birth rather than upon the fact of blood, we find a great state reverting to the blood notion. This, though, in an international sense, is that state's way of handling the problem of a minority. This reference may thoughtlessly cause us to assume that the world as a whole is slipping back, but individual man who finds himself a member of a minority group can count mighty gains for his class in the last 30 years. Before the World War in Europe there were 40,000,000 people who were counted among the minorities—today there are but 10,000,000. Present-day Russia's treatment of her minority groups is such a striking contrast to the old Russia's method that this problem of world-wide significance may find its solution in that land. If it should, what an epochal change we have witnessed without being conscious of it.

I count as the outstanding gain of the past 30 years the statute of Westminster adopted in 1931. The British Commonwealth of Nations came into existence as a result of the World War, for that war and its peace brought to an end the legal structure of the British Empire. Once again history calls our attention to the irony of crooked thinking. When the parts of the British Empire were given separate seats in the Assembly of the League, the overly wise and overly cautious observers of our own land overlooked the real importance of that act. They presumed British selfishness and the stacking of the League Assembly with British votes. This was not so, as the statute of Westminster proves. The arrangement was, in fact, the recognition of the principles of independence. Since 1931 an act of the Canadian Parliament is final. There is no appeal to the British Parliament and there is no vetoing of an act by the British Parliament. Read the law:

"No law and no provision of any law made after the commencement of this act by the Parliament of a Dominion shall be void or inoperative on the ground that it is repugnant to the law of England, or to the provisions of any existing or future act of Parliament of the United Kingdom or to any order, rule, or regulation made under any such act, and the powers of the Parliament of the Dominion shall include the power to repeal or amend any such act, order, rule, or regulation insofar as the same is part of the law of the Dominion."

That is a changed attitude. The idea as expressed now was not original with the British Government of 1931. It is old thought. It was developed out of American experience and first suggested to England in 1775 when our American fathers just 1 year before they adopted our Declaration of Independence offered the theory to the British Crown in what is known in our history as the Olive Branch Petition. Under the Statute of Westminster a dominion becomes a self-governing state, in Canada's case a republic, to all intents and purposes.

It is not for us here tonight to make the world over, but the stage is set for a mighty change in outlook—a new attitude which will result in a new relationship—and it has all been done by the most peaceful of processes and the highest law of the British Commonwealth of Nations and the Congress of the United States. Let us review what has taken place step by step. First England speaks to Canada thus: "That which your Parliament decides shall be unquestioned by us." What latitude for changed attitudes and new relationships! Secondly, Congress speaks: "When an American Republic finds itself at war with a non-American state our neutrality law shall not apply." Is that a changed attitude? No, say many, that is as old as our Monroe Doctrine. But that is hardly true, for our Monroe Doctrine is of our own making while the provision in our neutrality act is America's response to the spirit of a similar act initiated by certain Latin American states during the late war. At the council table of the Pan American Union there has always been a vacant chair—a thoughtful reservation made for Canada. The stage is properly set today in law and attitude for that seat to be taken. All Americans pray for its fulfillment. It should happen before President Roosevelt's proposed meeting of all the Americas in 1936.

Canada may now take her seat in the Pan American Union. Under the Act of Westminster she may assume the status of an American republic. She has long been a member in that sisterhood of states in spirit; now she may become a member in fact. The United States in her new neutrality law gave to Pan-Americanism and the Monroe Doctrine new meanings. Neighborliness reflecting mutuality presages the sisterhood of American republics.

The Monroe Doctrine, whether considered as an altruistic expression, a defensive measure, a reciprocal relationship, or a regional understanding, is still of our making and depends upon us for its perpetuation. It was never a static proposition, and it never will be, but the suggested concept of allowing it to evolve into the sisterhood of American republics and making it just that gives it an all-American ideal in very fact. With this changed attitude the responsibility for its maintenance no longer rests upon us; it rests upon the whole of North and South America. A union of spirit, a union of hope, a union of aspiration. A dream of a Bolivar come true! A dream even better than Bolivar's, for Bolivar thought in terms of a political unity. To us that thought seems, and is, an anachronism, for we know today a better and a surer unity. It is the bond of the spirit, a bond of mutual endeavor, a bond of mutual helpfulness. I shall leave this thought by reference to our ancient story, Shall we live on our neighbors or shall we live with our neighbors? There is a greater chance today that we will choose the latter than we would have done 30 years ago.

Are we dreaming idle dreams when we speak of a new world built on self-control and self-restraint? The motto of the new Monroe Doctrine and the new Pan American Union, if I have caught its spirit, is, "In unity there is strength, but only in self-control is there unity." After 30 years some dreams seem to be coming true!

The last 30 years have given the world many an international institution. The outstanding ones are the Council and the Assembly of the League, the Permanent Court of Arbitration, the Permanent Court of International Justice and the International Labor Organization. These institutions are not static. If we view them even during their short lives we discover substantial growth. If we get too close we may become discouraged, because they are very human. In purpose these institutions are complex.

Adhering to the theory that history is a process of change, the first stage of the League's evolution represented a combination of capitalistic nations against a revolutionary Russia. That stage passed with Russia's entrance into the League, and with its passing an entirely new approach to world outlook should have followed. In the Pacific, Russia, although an outstanding Pacific power, was not a party to the Washington Conference and its treaties, this primarily because unconsciously the Washington Conference states accepted the League reaction against Russia. Russia's entrance into the League, like our recognition of Russia, gave Russia nothing which she was not entitled to, for she merely took a place which the covenant makers anticipated, but with her entrance there was a de facto change. Russia was no longer, either consciously or unconsciously, united against. As a naval power she was free to build, while Japan, her nearest neighbor, was bound by treaty. This change should have been apparent to all. I, for one, attempted to make this plain and suggested a consultation of powers bound by our Washington Conference treaties. Not a single editor, and I am sure no official saw my point. Japan had left her place of easy access to the ear of the world when she withdrew from the League. In the matter of China's territorial integrity, Russia again was not bound, although by her own acts she recognized the spirit of the nine-power pact and later assumed the general League obligations. Thus the five-power treaties both needed revision and expansion. But no nation made the suggestion. In Europe sweeping changes brought like results. Changes like these were anticipated by the League framers. Article 19, if properly used, would keep the League a living organism, and that is what it must be if it is to serve long. Even a rigid constitution must not be a static document. Change is life's first fact. A peaceful process, a new idea, a changed stage for action with new relationships should attract the attention of governments quite as readily as do marching feet. Until the world learns this hardest of all social and political rules there will not be prosperity at home or peace abroad.

The world organization is faced with three conflicts which must be settled before the League can become stable:

First. The conflicts growing out of the relation between the League and the treaty of which the League Covenant is a part. One of the chief duties of the League is to aid in the enforcement of treaty provisions. If a treaty provision is unjust and the League attempts to perpetuate the injustice, the League cannot help but fail. Such failures are due to the original injustice. We may illustrate this by our own experience with the treaty. History will record the fact that our country accepted all the harsh, warlike elements of the Treaty of Versailles and dodged responsibility for constructive elements leading to world organization for peaceful process; but it also stands to the glory of our country that we have never attempted to enforce our rights under the treaty. Had we attempted to enforce all our rights or all of Germany's promises under the treaty, our armies would be still in the Rhineland. Has America failed because we did not see that the treaty was respected? The League has done quite as well as we have on that score. Has America failed because the Dawes plan and the Young plan are not working and we are not succeeding in collecting our debts? America has condemned by legal and governmental action the war between Italy and Ethiopia, but the war has gone on. It would be as logical to condemn us as to condemn the League for what is happening. The problem is not easy. I do not blame anyone, but I do blame the useless loss of life and property, the useless misery when these are measured by the accomplishments. It is not the method of international control that is at fault; it is the wrongdoer among the nations. If war is a crime, it should be treated as a crime is treated; if it is a disease, it should be treated as a disease; if it is a thing of glorious honor, let us recognize it as such, repent of the fact that in a moment of thoughtlessness we condemned it, and glorify all that war stands for.

Second. The League idea for maintaining peace in the world is built upon the theory of preponderance—that is, all nations shall unite against an erring one. The alliance idea is built upon the balance theory. The two are in conflict. They do not and will not work together. I need not say more. My point is proved by the facts of today.

Thirdly. The great conflict which must be solved is whether the general theory or the particular right shall prevail. This problem has been our own. Even in our Federal Government we have not yet solved it. There is no way in the United States for the Federal Government to force a State against its will without creating civil war. Therefore, in the policies of world organization there will be no way of coercing a state against its will short of the use of war. If war is resorted to for the purpose of stopping war, war is increased, not diminished. It is on the acceptance of this political fact that I would suggest that we proceed. As long as the parts of world organization are sovereign entities, we must build on them and not upon the general idea. I can illustrate this by pointing out the primary reason why our naval conferences have not attained a more lasting success. We have attempted to approach the naval question in a general way by reducing tonnage, or the caliber of guns, or the number of guns or the instrument of destruction. That is definitely the wrong approach, because it invites substitution and causes the individual nation to attempt to gain advantages within the agreement. For example, if tonnage is reduced in an attempt to control size, a nation may build larger ships by reducing the armor weight.

There is only one rule that I know that can be successful in international relations, and that is that no nation asks another to do that which it itself would not do. Knowing this, why should we not attempt to make governments justify their own policies and their own defensive needs in the presence of other governments, instead of attempting to curb one another. A navy department can justify its need to its own parliament or congress, but never does it speak frankly when it talks to the outside world. Take our own case for example. If we have an idea that we must fight the combined strength of all the fleets in the world in either the Pacific or the Atlantic, let us figure out how many ships, how many men, and how many airplanes it would take to do the job, then go into a conference and say that we need this minimum. It would be very much harder to justify an absurd national policy if nations were made to speak the truth and tell their fears; and when I say "to make governments tell the truth" I trust that no one will quote me as saying that governments maliciously lie. I would, however, like to know for my own satisfaction just exactly what America herself thinks should be her national policy in regard to defense. If all nations expressed themselves openly and asserted their real fears, the cure could be attempted. Until this is done there will not be success in armament or naval conferences.

What are the significant facts that are of interest to the American Society of International Law which are noticeable in 1936 but which were hardly dreamed of in 1906? In 1907 I ran across a Japanese prophecy. It was a very old one. It said that when men should fly like birds, 10 kings would go to war. As men have learned to fly war has assumed a wider concern. I did not dream that I should see that prophecy fulfilled. If the prophecy had read, "When men fly, 50 nations would consult together in one place", I would not have believed that. In the last 30 years we have seen nations willing to leave to third parties the settlement of their differences. We have seen a complete reversal of fundamental theories in regard to national expansion. We have seen small nations justified especially in the minds of their own people when great nations through fallacious theories have brought misery to their own. "The white man's burden", "dollar diplomacy", and the pronouncement that "wherever an American dollar is invested there should be an American battleship to defend it", is no longer uttered by the tongues of statesmen. "Spread-eagleism" has ceased to be universal. America has reversed herself by stressing duties instead of rights in her neutrality policy. The mandate system has been tried and has worked as well in international law as the trustee system has worked in civil law. Neither can be cures for the advantage taker, the corrupt judge, or the dishonest guardian. We have given the Philippines their independence. The futility of war and the fallacy of conquest have been proved.

In 1906 we used to say "tempus fugit." Today we say "time marches on", and there is a difference in the thought behind those two expressions. More men come and go throughout the earth than ever before. The theory of the right to war has at least been tempered. Still there is much to be done. It is only through institutional growth that men go forward. It is not, though, the institutions themselves that count, but the fundamental theories on which those institutions rest. It is in these theories that I rest my hope. Let us put law where law has not been before.

As Shakespeare gives to the devil the right to quote scripture for his own purpose, I have taken liberies with the thoughts of many and used those thoughts for my own purpose tonight. In closing I choose one more. I have used it much of late, for to me it furnishes the key to the success or the failure of present-day international endeavor. In giving you this key I shall expand the ideas of the Greek Sophocles and cause Antigone to say, "It is easy to unite for evil, for war, or for hate; but it is hard to unite for love, for peace, or liberty." Knowing, then, that the problem is a difficult one, where in the last 30 years have we room for discouragement? All institutions which men use today may fail, but the ideas behind them are here to stay. Nations having learned to talk together in one place and states having shown a willingness to leave the settlement of their differences to third parties, the world now awaits a leader to breathe the soul of life into these great ideas that the dreams of the prophets may come true and the plans of the wise be not frustrated.

PROGRAM FOR NATIONAL ECONOMIC RECOVERY

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, my attention has been called to a program which, its sponsors feel, offers hope in the struggle to find a way to national economic recovery. In brief, this plan is an effort to restore the domestic market for raw materials and labor to American producers and workers and to make intelligent use of our resources—forests, farms, and mines. Those responsible for the program have organized for effective action under the name "Raw Materials National Council." Because of the importance of the questions involved, careful consideration should be given to every sincere approach to the problem.

Without expressing any opinion as to its merits, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a brief outline of the proposal.

There being no objection, the outline was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"PRESERVE AMERICA FOR AMERICANS"—A SURE WAY TO NATIONAL ECONOMIC RECOVERY

Here is a program that will stand the test of constitutionality and reason—it calls for no reforms or new taxes.

There is nothing wrong with the United States which cannot be corrected by means of a sound industrial policy and a sensible land-use program.

The good earth itself is the source of all new wealth. Yet millions of Americans, laboring to produce this wealth from forests, farms, and mines, are being crucified for the benefit of special interests.

The power to correct this situation lies in the hands of the people. Protests by individuals and separate groups are unavailing. United action is necessary to break down the conflict of interests which threatens our social stability.

The Raw Materials National Council grew out of the necessity for joint action by the producers of raw materials to preserve the American market for their products.

This organization is composed of representatives of agriculture, mining, oil, chemical, lumbering, and kindred industries working together to improve the economic position of all products of the ground. Its objectives conform to the best American traditions.

THE PROBLEM AND ITS SOLUTION

America's problem is to provide employment for 10,000,000 families now on relief by making proper use of our national resources. This organization proposes to solve this problem by utilizing its full strength to bring about the following program:

1. Immediate invalidation of all reciprocal-trade treaties to which the United States is a party by—

(a) Repeal by Congress of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act and renunciation of the pacts negotiated thereunder, or

(b) Appeal to the Federal courts, if necessary, and

(c) Restoration of the treaty-making power exclusively to the United States Senate.

2. An immediate, effective, and adequate upward revision of tariffs on raw-material products of American forests, farms, and mines to the extent that there shall be tariff parity between raw materials and manufactured goods, the purpose being to equalize, insofar as possible, the exchange value of all goods, products, and services in the domestic markets of the United States.

3. Enactment of the necessary legislation to restrict imports of all raw materials and substitutes therefor and manufactured goods to quotas based on the proven actual national requirements of same, and requiring importers of raw materials, unfinished, and semifinished products and substitutes and manufactured goods to obtain a certificate of necessity and convenience from the United States Department of Commerce before engaging in such business.

Fourth. Encouragement of a sound land-use program to stimulate the production of vegetable and fibrous crops which, through applied science, can be readily utilized by industry in place of raw materials now imported or otherwise unavailable. This program, the feasibility of which has been definitely established, will provide a profitable use for 50,000,000 acres of land not needed to grow farm products for foreign markets which no longer exist.

Fifth. Enactment of legislation to require all employers of labor to give preference insofar as possible to native-born and naturalized citizens of the United States, thus properly placing a premium on American citizenship.

Enactment of this program would enable American capital to conserve investments already made in land, mines, forests, and factories by protecting them against unfair foreign competition.

At the same time American capital would be free and have an incentive to develop the latent resources of the soil, forests, and mines of this Nation and to utilize domestic raw materials in the production of industrial goods.

By making use of domestic raw materials in industry employment will be expanded, national buying power will be enhanced and more property will be added to the tax rolls, thus spreading the burden of taxation.

A DEFINITE PROGRAM OF ACTION

To put this program into effect as quickly as possible the Raw Materials National Council has adopted the following plan of procedure:

First. Lend its services and cooperation to Congress in the preparation and enactment of the legislation necessary to render these principles operative.

Second. Counsel has been engaged to institute litigation for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act of 1934 in the event that Congress shall fail to repeal that measure.

Third. Establishment of associate units of the Raw Materials National Council in every county in the United States to mold and unite public sentiment in behalf of a program of national self-development and full utilization of American raw materials.

Under our democratic form of government the farmers, miners, forest workers, and common laborers have the strength of numbers—and therefore the power of votes—to translate this program into terms of law and economic policy.

Our national welfare plainly calls for an economy of abundance, not scarcity. It is important that we "Buy American." It is essential that we "Produce American."

American exports have never exceeded 10 percent of the total volume of business transacted. Adequate development and protection of our raw materials against foreign competition will create new buying power, which will more than compensate for any possible loss of export business which might result from the change of policy which this council proposes.

Wars grow out of trade rivalries and dependence upon other nations for certain basic raw materials. The pathway to enduring peace clearly lies in the direction of national self-development.

Present economic practices—particularly that of importing cheap war materials—serve to:

(a) Reduce American workingmen to the status of coolie laborers;

(b) Impose conditions approaching peasantry upon American farmers; and

(c) Endanger the security of scores of billions of dollars now invested in agriculture, forests, mines, and processing enterprises which cater primarily to the domestic market.

The work of the Raw Materials National Council is supported by the cooperation and voluntary contributions of persons, concerns, and associations engaged in the production and processing of raw materials produced on American soil and sold in the American market. The council serves as trustee for the funds.

Policies of the council will be determined by conference of interests participating in this movement.

To the end that a fundamentally sound national economy may be established in the United States, without regard to partisan or other affiliations, the Raw Materials National Council invites the cooperation and support of every American citizen affected by the inequitable and uneconomic trade practices which now prevail.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION—ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES A. FARLEY AT CHARLESTON, W. VA.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. James A. Farley at Middleburg Hall, Charleston, W. Va., April 22, 1936.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Let me begin my greeting to the Democracy of West Virginia with the statement that there is not a single cloud on the Democratic horizon.

Every straw that blows points to the reelection of President Roosevelt by a majority that will march in step with his election in 1932, and with the vote of applause and ratification that swelled our membership in the Senate and the House of Representatives in 1934.

Some of you might think the description of a cloudless sky is an exaggeration, in view of the anvil chorus being sounded by the Republican press and orators; but that is not a cloud. It is merely a dust storm, unpleasant to experience for the moment, but having no bearing on the general state of the political weather.

When I mention straws, I do not have reference primarily to the straw votes, so called, though I notice, as doubtless you have, that the prognostications based on this sample balloting that has become such a conspicuous feature of campaigns all tell the same story. They describe the steady increase of Roosevelt sentiment and point clearly to what is going to happen in November.

Straw votes may, and usually do, give a reasonable index to the direction of the public mind, but are no certain indication, any more than the weather report is an invariable guide to tomorrow's sunshine or rain, though it may be calculated on a scientific basis and comes out as prophesied most of the time. The indications I have in mind are very much more tangible than the straw votes. I mean by this that the registration figures, so far as they have been compiled, tell a story, the logic of which is absolute. Let us begin on the west coast. Every county in California shows an increase in Democratic registration of 50 percent, and a corresponding Republican decrease. Keep in mind the circumstance that prior to 1932 the Democratic Party in that State was in a state of almost total eclipse ever since 1916 when it gave victory to Woodrow Wilson for his second term. In 1932 Franklin D. Roosevelt carried the State by a majority of 400,000 votes. What is he going to do out there this year with the Democratic strength increased by one-half and the Republican strength down about the same amount?

Come on east as far as Nebraska and you will find the voting figures pointing along the same line. Next, look at Illinois, where the registration figures on the Democratic side were so vast that Mr. David Lawrence, recently mentioned by the Republican National Committee as a newspaper columnist whose comment fitted in with the G. O. P. publicity program, admitted the other day in his regular column that the Illinois figures showed that the Republicans had no chance for success this year. Like his brother columnist, Mr. Mark Sullivan, he observed that the Republicans' only chance would have been to effect a coalition with the conservatives in the Democratic Party, but conceded that it was too late to think of anything of that kind just now.

I am happy to learn that the result of the registration here in West Virginia yesterday gives the Democratic Party an enrollment of more than 100,000 over the Republicans. You may therefore rest assured that President Roosevelt will have a majority of at least 100,000 in West Virginia next November, surpassing the great Democratic victories of 1932 and 1934.

Let me digress for a moment and talk a little bit about the hypothetical coalition, which means that the Republicans might have abandoned their position as an independent minority party and produced a hybrid ticket with one of their own as candidate for President and some dissatisfied Democrat as Vice President, or vice versa. They speak of such a ticket as a missed opportunity. Actually there was no such opportunity. No Democrat of any standing would have been willing to lend his name to such a combination. In fact, practically all of those who were mentioned when that dream was being entertained let it be known that even though they differed with the administration on certain of its policies, they were Democrats first of all and would support the Democratic ticket as usual. Moreover, it is very probable that such a ticket would have so offended dyed-in-the-wool Republicans that a multitude of them would have abstained from voting or come over to our side as a token of their disgust at their party leaders abandoning the historic Republican principles. Of course, this is merely an academic question, but it may be of interest because it appears that it will be the only alibi the losing party may be able to suggest for the pale showing it is going to make in November.

Now, let's get off the detour and back to the theme I was discussing. Let's go into the East. Pittsburgh has always been a Republican city. This year, for the first time that I can recall, western Pennsylvania shows more registered Democrats than Republicans. The figures for eastern Pennsylvania have not yet come to my attention, but I will be very much surprised if Philadelphia does not show a corresponding increase in our strength. That has been the trend for some time. They have always elected a Republican mayor in that city, the last one before the present mayor by 400,000 majority. The present mayor only got one-tenth as large a verdict. So we can make a happy guess about what will happen there.

My own State of New York sounds the same note, and I think I can assure you, with no danger of events proving me a false prophet, that President Roosevelt will be returned by the Empire State with a majority greater than that he received in 1932.

Reverting to the Middle West, we find that in the primaries in Wisconsin the vote registered for our candidate exceeded that cast for all Republican candidates for President put together by about 2 to 1.

In estimating the importance of such figures wherever it is possible I like to look at the other side. In the case of Wisconsin I was electrified by reading the comment of Mr. Mark Sullivan in the always anti-Roosevelt New York Herald Tribune. This talented writer and political statistician sought to soften the blow to his party by suggesting that in November, when there would be only one Republican candidate instead of half a dozen opposing Mr. Roosevelt, the Republican vote would be greater. I think that is a brand-new thing, either in politics or mathematics. I seem to recall that in school I was taught that the whole must always be greater than a part. Mr. Sullivan's logic would appear to reason just the contrary—that the vote for one Republican contestant would be bigger than the vote for all the Republican contestants put together.

So you see the political sky looks very rosy to us Democrats. Some of you might think that this would suggest a jubilation rather than a campaign. I sincerely hope that that idea does not become too prevalent.

It has been my experience that the greatest danger in any political struggle lies in overconfidence. Let the feeling get about that the result of an election is a foregone conclusion, and that therefore it is permissible to take things for granted and to abate any effort, not infrequently the result is terrible disappointment. We Democrats must remember that the minority party this year is financed to an extent that dwarfs anything in the history of Presidential elections. Not only has their regular organization a huge fund but its allies, like the American Liberty League, have spent and are spending as much or more than the Republican National Committee. Moreover, as you may have observed, the Du Pont dynasty and its satellite corporation heads and affiliated multimillionaire enemies of the New Deal are financing any fly-by-night organization that anybody has been able to think up. The Lobby Investigating Committee has brought out that it was this same moneyed group that financed the anti-Roosevelt movement in Georgia. That movement was engineered by Mr. John Henry Kirby. He was revealed in a previous investigation as the titular head of two or three so-called leagues, which the late Senator Caraway described as nonexistent, inasmuch as they had no members except the self-named officers who collected some millions of dollars on the pretext of lobbying against various forms of legislation. That committee was never able to find that it had spent any of its collections of consequence except in salaries and donations to some of its own people.

It is easy to laugh at the efforts of some of these political racketeers who are reaping such an abundant harvest from the Liberty Leaguers and their kin. For example, I have recently learned of one group soliciting support for an anti-administration drive on the ground that ours was a Socialist administration and that the Socialists had stolen the party from the Democrats at the 1932 convention. They did not go into details, but the idea conjured up a picture of myself, perhaps with false whiskers, gathering up Socialist delegations and of Senator Carter Glass and Secretary of State Cordell Hull cooking up a Socialist platform, and with the late Senator Thomas J. Walsh, of Montana, and Senator Alben W. Barkley, of Kentucky, presiding over a convention, the bible of which, according to this hypothesis, must have been Karl Marx's "Das Kapital." This particular incident, itself ridiculous, nevertheless indicates the extremes to which the money that is back of the Republican campaign is willing to go. They even financed a campaign in the deep South of which the wife of President Roosevelt was the target. A group that will stoop to such tactics is capable of almost any infamy.

With such an enemy, the Democratic army can never afford to rest on its arms. It has to be alert at all times and never abate its militant activities.

So, while I tell you that every portent points to a stupendous Democratic triumph next November, I must caution you to keep up your work, to hold your organization at the highest point of efficiency, to meet every attack from the other side. Fortunately, we have all the best of the argument. We have a program that, whatever flaws may have been disclosed in its administration, has nevertheless put us on a plane of prosperity that is the admiration and envy of the whole world. Our adversaries have been unable to formulate any kind of a program. About the best they can do is to suggest a shift in words, which is a tacit endorsement of what we have done, and try to convince the people that they are better fitted to carry out this program than we are.

The reason that the Democratic administration continues to have the confidence of a vast majority of our people is perfectly obvious and extremely simple.

President Roosevelt took office with the Nation in as desperate a state as it had ever been in since its foundation. The acts he sponsored have replaced misery with an approach to contentment, have supplanted fear and distress with hope and cheer. You have only to look at the columns of the newspapers—I do not mean the propaganda columns of the Republican press but the business columns, which, as they deal with the plain figures of industries and securities, are not susceptible of such distortion as are the editorial arguments and the inspired headlines on antiadministration speeches. The whole country reflects the advance in business, and your own State of West Virginia shares in this sentiment and will participate in the natural result of an enthusiastic endorsement of the President next November.

You have no need to go far afield to learn the result of the courageous policies that were fathered by the President. Your own newspapers have told the tale, and I would like to read you just a few extracts from the files of your own journals. In 1934 your excellent Republican newspaper, the Charleston Mail, published an interview with one of your department store chiefs, who said:

"It is particularly encouraging to observe that practically every element in the country's population is benefiting by the New Deal." That was in March. In May of the same year (1934) in the same newspaper the announcement was made that "industry improved after being virtually asleep for 4 years." A little earlier the Charleston Mail, editorially dealing with the state of business, remarked that "the optimism in the steel industry is common to most industries. The business pick-up seems to be gaining momentum, with the probability that the next few months will see more rapid advancement."

Let us jump a year, and we find that same newspaper, now so critical of the administration, announcing under the head of "Vast growth for city trade noted", this statement of fact: "Bank debits up forty-three million and volume doubles 1933 total. Industries are working at capacity."

The other newspapers of your State equally indicate how well we are getting along. The independent Wheeling News-Register, also last December, put it this way: "The policy of the New Deal, the program of President Roosevelt, are accomplishing exactly what they were intended to accomplish: First, a restoration of the buying power of the farmer. Second, an increase in employment in industry. Third, a sound and substantial banking condition. All of these things have been achieved and the foundation of enduring prosperity has been laid."

And the Republican Huntington Herald-Adviser, at the close of the year, printed a story reciting as indicative of affairs in this State "the large amount of substantial construction, the big increase in bank debits, a Christmas holiday retail trade that exceeded any in several years. * * * Government spending contributed much toward new construction in Huntington and vicinity."

The increased farm income of your West Virginia farmers is indicated in various ways. For example, according to the Automobile Manufacturers Association, the registration of new passenger cars on farms and in your smaller towns increased 61 percent.

In 1932 West Virginia bought about 12,000 new automobiles. In 1935 it bought 32,700.

The statisticians tell us that $11,000,000 more new life insurance was taken out in this State in 1935 than in 1932. And the railroads report that they have shipped into this and other agricultural States nearly 40 percent more freight than the year before. You had in the West Virginia banks about $45,000,000 more bank deposits at the end of the last fiscal year than in any year previous. And perhaps of more significance is the circumstance that in five important cities of this State, where less than a million dollars was spent in 1933 for building, it had risen to over three millions in 1935.

Statistics are hard to listen to, I know, but in them lies the real explanation of the national faith in President Roosevelt and the complete answer to all that our adversaries have been shrieking about and will continue shrieking about for the next several months.

What these scolders and calamity howlers talk mostly about is Government extravagance. It would be a miracle, of course, if billions of dollars should be distributed in relief without some imperfections in the distribution. Undoubtedly you have even here some examples of people getting a bundle of food from the Government doles which they could have and should have paid for. It is quite possible that every man on emergency employment—which was deemed a better way of passing out relief than giving a direct dole—has not always done a full day's work for a meager day's pay. But what do these few dollars amount to in comparison with the general good that has kept a multitude from starvation and perhaps from violence.

Do any of you think that the $800,000 your farmers have received in rental and benefits are wasted? Do any of you believe that the $15,500,000 invested through the 43 C. C. C. camps in your State in the conservation and development of your forests and ranges and fire protection, erosion control, and flood control, has been squandered? Hasn't the physical benefit to your State been worth what it cost, without taking into consideration the salvation of 4,000 young men who except for this expenditure would have been left to the perils of vagrancy and the hopelessness of idleness?

In the total of Government expenditures our critics always list the money loaned on homes and farms, to banks and railroads, to the States themselves, as if it represented billions thrown away. An aggregate of perhaps $40,000,000 has been loaned in this way in West Virginia. It will all be paid back to the Government, for all the private loans were guaranteed by the same sort of securities on which your banks are lending money today. As a matter of fact, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which is the source of the greater part of this money, is a prosperous concern. Loans are being repaid to it faster than they are being advanced, so that it has today, I am informed, assets of $100,000,000 more than its liabilities.

The cry is raised that these loans have put the Government in business. Yes, the Government is in business. If it hadn't gone into business there wouldn't have been any business, and the Government is going to get out of business as soon as it possibly can. Which means that it will retire from the field as soon as business is able to pay its debts and stand up by itself.

What interests our citizens more than any other circumstance of the industrial situation is how they themselves have fared. You perhaps know that the income taxes for 1935 in West Virginia were approximately $2,000,000 more than in 1934. Nobody is likely to throw up his hat because he has paid more taxes, but when the taxes are translated into terms of income we find that the people of this State had incomes aggregating $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 more than they had last year. And if that does not represent just what your people hoped for when they voted out a do-nothing administration at Washington and voted in a do-something administration, what does it represent?

The job of completely restoring prosperity to this country of ours is by no means complete. We have still to get rid of a lot of unemployment. We have got to get people off the dole and to get things running again so that the ordinary problems of government may proceed unvexed by high taxes and that sort of thing.

Those politicians who are prophesying chaos and the men who are putting up the money for all this propaganda talk about an unbalanced Budget as if that were in itself an appalling calamity. Now just what does it mean? It means that the Government is in debt and that the people hold the amount of this debt. The Government and the people are one, as a matter of fact. The money represented by the red figures on the Treasury ledgers has not been burned up nor thrown into the sea. It has gone into the regular channels of trade and such of it as is not invested is in the bank deposits of our citizens.

In due course of time, provided that there is no interruption in our progress, the Government debt will be cut down in the ordinary, orderly processes of the Treasury. Already because of the refinancing, the burden of the interest charges on the expanded Government debt is less in actual dollars and cents than it was before the depression compelled the Government to spend a lot of money.

There is nothing to worry about, despite the clamors of the opposition. It is perfectly natural that the minority party, anxious to get back into power, should indulge in extravagant and in many cases absurd denunciation of everything the present administration does.

This outfit had its opportunity. The course that President Roosevelt has pursued was open to President Hoover. If he had shown the same courage, resource, and decision that President Roosevelt has shown, we would never have reached the state that the country was in when the new administration came to Washington.

The Republican administration failed us in our extremity. It permitted us to drift into a state of misery and despair. President Roosevelt has lifted us out of that condition and got the business of the Nation to going again. It took a brave man to tackle the problem as he tackled it. It took a wise man to realize that drastic conditions demanded drastic remedies. It took a far-seeing man to visualize the ultimate consequences of his program. Franklin D. Roosevelt had the courage, the wisdom, and the foresight requisite for the job.

It was no surprise to him when, with the return of a measure of prosperity, the greatest beneficiaries of that program turned against him and sought to bring back the era of special privilege. He has faith in the people, even as the people have faith in him. And the result of this mutual appreciation will be that at the next opportunity the country has to testify its feeling it will say to Franklin D. Roosevelt, "You have done a great job, and we want you to go on with it."

And I am just as sure as I am that I am standing here, and delighted to be here, that the voice of West Virginia will be enthusiastic in that popular chorus.

THE CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

Mr. COOLIDGE. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a message from the President of the United States to the members of the Civilian Conservation Corps, which was read over the radio on the 17th instant by Robert Fechner, Director of Emergency Conservation Work, together with a radio address delivered by Mr. Fechner at the same time.

There being no objection, the message from the President and the address by Mr. Fechner were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT

To the million and a half young men and war veterans who have been or are today enrolled in the Civilian Conservation Corps camps, I extend greetings on this third anniversary of the establishment of the first C. C. C. camp. Idle through no fault of your own, you were enrolled from city and rural homes and offered an opportunity to engage in healthful, outdoor work on forest, park, and soil-conservation projects of definite practical value to all the people of the Nation. The promptness with which you seized the opportunity to engage in honest work, the willingness with which you have performed your daily tasks, and the fine spirit you have shown in winning the respect of the communities in which your camps have been located merits the admiration of the entire country. You and the men who have guided and supervised your efforts have cause to be proud of the record the C. C. C. has made in the development of sturdy manhood and in the initiation and prosecution of a conservation program of unprecedented proportions.

I recall that on July 17, 1933, at a time when the corps was just getting into stride, I predicted that through the C. C. C. we would graduate a fine group of strong young men, trained to self-discipline and willing and proud to work. I did not misjudge the loyalty, the spirit, the industry, or the temper of American youth. Although many of you entered the camps undernourished and discouraged through inability to obtain employment as you came of working age, the hard work, regular hours, the plain, wholesome food, and the outdoor life of the C. C. C. camps brought a quick response in improved morale. As muscles hardened and you became accustomed to outdoor work you grasped the opportunity to learn by practical training on the job and through camp educational facilities. Many of you rose to responsible positions in the camps. Since the corps began some 1,150,000 of you have been graduated, improved in health, self-disciplined, alert, and eager for the opportunity to make good in any kind of honest employment.

Our records show that the results achieved in the protection and improvement of our timbered domain, in the arrest of soil wastage, in the development of needed recreational areas, in wildlife conservation, and in flood control have been as impressive as the results achieved in the rehabilitation of youth. Through your spirit and industry it has been demonstrated that young men can be put to work in our forests, parks, and fields on projects which benefit both the Nation's youth and conservation generally.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

RADIO ADDRESS BY ROBERT FECHNER

On a number of occasions during the last 3 years I have had the pleasure of talking to C. C. C. enrollees and the radio public generally about the Civilian Conservation Corps and the work it is doing to solve the problem of finding employment for enforcedly idle youth and to preserve and develop our natural resources. The first time that I spoke over the radio about this program I told you that we planned to take a vast army of idle young men from the streets of our cities and from depression-hit homes and put them to work in our forests and parks on work projects of a type which would gradually increase the usefulness and value of the Nation's half billion acres of timbered lands. Today, on this third anniversary of the establishment of the first C. C. C. camp, I propose to outline briefly the history of the camps and at the same time give you some of the high lights of our accomplishments. Above all, I want to express my heartfelt appreciation to all of the 1,500,000 young men and war veterans who have been enrolled in camps for their fine cooperation and praiseworthy conduct.

I feel that a major share of the credit for the success of the C. C. C. camps must be attributed to the fact that the boys have adapted themselves so quickly to outdoor work and have maintained such friendly and cordial relations with the communities with which they have come in contact. The fact that we have had literally thousands of applications for new camps speaks volumes for the conduct of the enrollees and the character of the work they have done.

The cooperation given by communities in the vicinity of the camps has been a material factor in their success. In the beginning many localities protested having a camp placed near them, but this attitude quickly changed and now the protests come when it becomes necessary to close a camp. Many comforts and conveniences for the enrollees have been provided, together with opportunities for social activities. They have in reality been "good neighbors."

The records of the C. C. C. show that every State and virtually every county in the United States has participated in this program during the 3 years it has been undergoing a thorough testing in the laboratory of experience. During this period an average of about 375,000 young men and war veterans, together with about 10,000 Indians, have worked in forests, in parks, on agricultural land, and on flood-control projects. We started out with 300,000 men and at our peak strength we had 519,000 enrolled men at work. Today our authorized strength is 350,000 men and we propose to maintain this strength during the balance of the year. At first the men occupied tents but these have now been replaced with wooden barracks. In recent months we have experimented with portable housing for the C. C. C. and have found it very satisfactory.

The first Civilian Conservation Corps camps were established in national forests and national parks. Later we set up camps in State and private forests, in State park lands, on farms where erosion was beginning to wash away the valuable topsoil, in wildlife refuges, on a few flood-control projects, and on the public domain in the West, where work has been carried on to increase the value of the land for grazing purposes. From the beginning a big majority of the camps have been located on National, State, and private forest lands. In the first year we established 1,462 camps. Later this number was increased to a peak of 2,652 in the fall of 1935. At the present time we have 2,158.

The work accomplished by the C. C. C. organization runs up to enormous totals. I could easily spend the full time allotted me just reading off the detailed work accomplishments as they have been compiled in statistical form for us by the Bureau of the Census. It will suffice, I believe, however, if I call your attention to a few of the outstanding things we have done.

In the first place, the presence of C. C. C. men in the woods and the completion of such physical improvements as thousands of fire towers, thousands of miles of new telephone lines, and thousands of miles of truck trails have resulted in substantially lowering the national-forest fire bill each year that the men of the C. C. C. have been in the field.

Due to the stimulus of the C. C. C. program the States have added hundreds of thousands of acres to their State park recreational areas. Many of these new park lands have been or are now being developed by C. C. C. men. The addition of these new recreational areas and the development of thousands of acres of park and forest lands for recreational use has opened up new opportunities for millions to get out into the open and enjoy themselves during leisure hours.

The C. C. C. supplied manpower needed by the Soil Conservation Service to advance its soil-conservation program. To date more than 2,000,000 acres of agricultural lands have been treated and close to 2,000,000 soil-erosion check dams built.

But as great as the conservation benefits have been, I consider the aid we have given to unemployed youth the most important accomplishment of the C. C. C. program. In the C. C. C. we have not been content to take over the young men sent to us from public relief rolls and simply give them a job. We have furnished each man with wholesome food, comfortable clothing, adequate shelter, medical attention, first-class leadership, a chance to improve his education, and an opportunity to learn by doing. We have improved the health of enrollees, built up their self-respect, and made them better citizens. Each enrollee is paid a cash allowance sufficiently large to enable him to purchase necessities and send $25 a month home to his family. The morale-building value of enabling a youngster to become the breadwinner of his family cannot be overestimated.

The health and safety of the individual enrollee has been stressed by all officials connected with the C. C. C. organization. Our program includes the preparation of a carefully balanced food diet, the vaccination and inoculation of enrollees against contagious diseases, and the placing of constant emphasis on personal hygiene, health, and safety.

Two years ago we initiated an organized safety program to reduce accidents among C. C. C. personnel. This program has been well accepted in the field by both the supervisory staff and enrollees. Through their cooperation we have shown a steady decrease in accidental deaths and lost-time accidents.

The educational work in the camps has been of increasing value and importance. The elimination of illiteracy has been the first objective, and 25,000 men have been taught how to read and write. Enrollees in the camps have found opportunities for practical training along such lines as surveying, bridge and road building, forestry, terracing, landscaping, and auto mechanics. School authorities in many cities and smaller communities have generously offered their facilities to enrollees. This has enabled many of our boys to finish their educational work successfully and to receive formal credit for it. Citizenship and character training are a part of the program in every camp.

The C. C. C. has been able to accomplish much in training and developing capable citizens who understand their duties and responsibilities, who know how to work, who understand the importance of good deportment and the qualifications that are so essential to success in life.

The moral and religious needs have not been neglected. Approximately 300 Army Reserve chaplains devote their full time to C. C. C. religious work. They are assisted by a large number of clergymen of all denominations who have willingly volunteered their services in this work. Religious services are held in the camps and transportation is provided to take the men to nearby churches. Reports regularly submitted show a very satisfactory attendance at these services. In fact, many clergymen express the opinion that many enrollees are now attending services more regularly than before they came to the camp.

Our records show that each year since the C. C. C. camps were initiated close to 500,000 young men have had the benefits of C. C. C. work and training. We have not been able to give jobs to every unemployed youth, but during the last year we have taken care of virtually all young men between 17 and 28 who wanted to enter the camps and whose families were on relief rolls. I am confident from letters I have received and from my own personal observation that the C. C. C. camps have cut down juvenile delinquency, have taught new health and work habits to hundreds of thousands of young men, and have turned out large numbers of youths equipped through training on the job and in other phases of our educational system to make a place for themselves in modern society.

I would like to call the attention of employers to the type of men we are developing in the C. C. C. Our boys are really getting a training that will be distinctly valuable to them and to their future employers when they leave the camps to enter business or industrial life. An honorable discharge certificate from the C. C. C. is a valuable recommendation for any boy. We extend a hearty invitation to employers to visit the camps when they are in need of good men and get acquainted with those in charge for the purpose of offering employment to suitable men.

In conclusion I want to offer my personal tribute to the men themselves—those now in camp as well as those who have completed their enrollment. Their fine conduct and splendid service has made the C. C. C. one of the most popular activities of the Federal Government. It makes it practically certain the camps will become a permanent institution.

You men in the camps have established a tradition of which you may be justly proud. I am confident your pride in the part you have been permitted to play in this organization will be reflected through the years to come. I am proud to have been associated with you.

ALLEGED SEIZURE OF TELEGRAMS

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD resolutions adopted by the American Newspaper Publishers' Association in their convention at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, regarding the activities of the Black Lobby Investigating Committee.

There being no objection, the resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Following is the text of the resolution on freedom of the press, on the Black Lobby Investigating Committee and the Federal Communications Commission for the seizure of private papers of publishers and other citizens, as adopted April 23, 1936, by the American Newspaper Publishers Association in convention at the Waldorf-Astoria:

"Whereas a committee of the United States Senate, under the specious pretext of investigating lobbying, has undertaken a campaign of persecution and harassment against individuals, organizations, and newspapers which have in any manner criticized or opposed Members of Congress or measures before Congress; and

"Whereas the members of the committee and their agents have violated the first amendment to the Constitution by indiscriminate seizures of the telegraph correspondence and press messages of newspapers, which is an infringement of the freedom of the press, and have further violated that amendment by a campaign of intimidation and harassment designed to prevent citizens exercising their right of petition for the redress of grievances; and

"Whereas the members of the committee and their agents have repeatedly violated the fourth amendment to the Constitution by unreasonable searches and seizures and by the use of subpenas of the nature of illegal general warrants; and

"Whereas the committee and the agents have violated the fifth amendment to the Constitution by taking the property of citizens without due process of law; and

"Whereas the committee has been aided and abetted by the Federal Communications Commission in all these violations, through the seizure by the Commission, in violation of the law establishing it and of the opinion of its own counsel in previous cases, of telegraphic messages, which were made available to the Senate committee: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the association commends those persons who by their appeals to the courts to enforce their rights under the Constitution have helped to curb the illegal conduct of the committees and the Commission, and it further recommends that they and all other victims of the illegal acts of the Senate Investigating Committee and the Federal Communications Commission seek civil damages from the agents of the committee and the members and employees of the Commission for the trespasses against them, and demand the prosecution of all involved in the odious affair under the criminal statutes of the United States."

ACTIVITIES OF LOBBY INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE—EDITORIAL FROM NEW YORK POST

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the New York Post entitled "Freedom of the Press."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Post]

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

Col. Robert R. McCormick doesn't bear much resemblance to the Statue of Liberty, and his report on freedom of the press to the American Newspaper Publishers Association is about on a level with an American Liberty League release. But it's not a bad idea to have publishers talking about freedom of the press—even if it is for the wrong reasons. They may talk themselves into exercising it.

The horrendous struggle of the American press to preserve its freedom under the Roosevelt era falls somewhat short of tragedy. It began with the N. R. A. code for newspapers. Some publishers who hadn't the courage to tell the truth about the local dog catcher suddenly began to protest that their freedom of expression would be hopelessly hamstrung if they had to pay a minimum of $15 a week to a reporter.

It became a habit. Like many other wealthy men, most publishers didn't and don't like Mr. Roosevelt because he has been trying to give the underdog a break. They began looking under the bed twice daily. Their editorials told how the United States under Roosevelt was just like Russia under Stalin, Germany under Hitler, Italy under Mussolini, and Rome under Nero. They forgot to mention one little difference. They could say so in public.

Howard Davis, of the Herald Tribune, spoke at the A. N. P. A. meeting. He can at least boast—though we never heard him do it—that his paper, unlike Bertie McCormick's, does say a vigorous word from time to time on behalf of freedom of the press for those with whom it disagrees. It did so when District Attorney Dodge tried to clamp down on the Communist Daily Worker.

Davis quoted a remark of Pulitzer's about the importance of a free press. To us the most significant part of that statement was "A cynical, mercenary, demagogic press will produce in time a people as base as itself." The A. N. P. A.'s latest to-do is about the supposed "freedom of the press" of the most "cynical, mercenary, demagogic" chain of papers in the country—the Hearst press.

The A. N. P. A. is terribly worried about dictatorship. So are we. The seeds of trouble in this country are being sown by a network of Fascist and semi-Fascist propaganda agencies parading as voices of the people when they are really barnacles on the purse of Wall Street. The Black committee is showing up these organizations, their real backers, their real motives, their ugly methods, their fake telegrams.

Senator BLACK and his colleagues are cramping the style of these budding Fascist groups, which are the real menace to American liberties. Does the A. N. P. A. have one word of condemnation for their methods? Does it raise its voice on behalf of the freedom of minority groups? No. It seeks to make America's most irresponsible publisher a martyr to freedom of the press.

Mr. Davis had a word to say about those who "believe in free speech only for themselves or for those who agree with them." That applies to both Colonel McCormick and Hearst.

Arthur Hays Sulzberger, of the New York Times, went to the heart of the problem when he stressed the fact that freedom of the press is not merely the right of a publisher to print or misprint whatever he chooses but also the right of the people to have "accurate news, fairly presented."

Our friends at the A. N. P. A. quoted Alcæus, Aristotle, Seldon, Milton, Hobbes, Locke, and other dead worthies. They cited Wilkes and other dead heroes of the free press. What are they going to do about live issues and live heroes? What about the Tampa murder, Angelo Herndon, Tom Mooney, and the struggles of the Arkansas sharecroppers?

So long as readers continue to see large sections of our press bending the knee to any wealthy interest, suppressing this, and distorting that, hounding reformers, slandering labor, keeping silent in the face of suffering and deception, the public isn't going to take these crocodile tears about "freedom of the press" very seriously.

It is characteristic that the A. N. P. A. held its great forum on freedom of the press behind closed doors and gave out canned releases to the press.

REGULATION OF COMMODITY EXCHANGES

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I desire to discuss for a time House bill 6772, known as the commodities exchange bill. This bill to amend the Grain Futures Act has been before the Senate for some time, having passed the House of Representatives last year. A similar bill passed the House in 1934. The bill has the hearty and widespread support of the people of the West, and particularly in my section of the intermountain country. The measure also has the support of the Secretary of Agriculture and the administrators of the Grain Futures Act. Most of the provisions of this measure have had the support of former Secretaries of Agriculture.

The inadequacy of the original Grain Futures Act has been realized by the administration and by the public generally for some years. More than 12 years' experience in the administration of the law has disclosed the defects and shortcomings of the original act. Under it and its interpretation by the courts certain vicious practices are permitted which it is the purpose of this bill to correct.

THE SCOPE OF THE ACT ENLARGED

In the first place, it is thought advisable to enlarge the scope of the act to reach trading in additional commodities. The present law, which was passed in 1922, limits its application to trading in wheat, corn, oats, barley, rye, flax, and sorghum futures. The term "grain" is there defined to include only these commodities. It is proposed in the present bill to change the word "grain" to "commodities" and define it as including in addition to the products included in the original act mill feeds, rice, butter, and eggs. As the bill came to the Senate from the House it also included cotton, but the Committee on Agriculture amended it by striking out the word "cotton" and by adding an amendment modifying the Cotton Futures Act.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator that, while the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry took cotton out of the bill, a very large number of Senators want cotton included in the bill. We are anxious to have the bill brought up for consideration. We want it considered. We are opposed to the Senate committee amendment which undertakes to strike cotton out of the bill. We think it ought to be in the bill.

Speaking for myself alone, I merely desire to express the view that while we favor the passage of the commodities exchange bill as it came from the House, we are opposed to the action of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in striking cotton from the measure. We propose to fight to retain cotton in the bill.

Mr. POPE. While that is the action of the committee, there are many members of the committee who are in favor of retaining cotton in the list of commodities to be covered by the bill.

The reason for broadening the scope of the act by including the additional commodities is that the same practices exist in trading in futures of such additional commodities as in those contained in the present law. It is possible that still other commodities might be properly added, but a substantial demand has arisen to include in this bill the additional commodities referred to.

At this point I desire to refer particularly to the demand to include butter and eggs, as it was made in the recent hearings. In the testimony of Mr. Donald Kane, attorney for the National Milk Producers Federation, composed of 55 cooperative dairy marketing associations throughout the United States, he introduced a letter written by the general manager of the Dairy and Poultry Cooperatives, Inc., Chicago, Ill. The letter reads in part as follows:

> We are quite anxious dairy and poultry products be included in the exchange bill. * * * While the produce exchanges have not been apparently subjected to as much "skullduggery" effecting the interests of the producers as has been the case with grain, cotton, and some other projects, it is now a noticeable fact the big grain firms on the Chicago Board of Trade are taking membership in the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. It is our opinion if certain practices are denied them in connection with the grain, cotton, and other commodity exchanges, they will transfer their operations largely to the mercantile exchange and put into effect these same practices that have proven so detrimental to the producers in the other exchanges.

SPECULATION LIMITED

In the present law a member of a contract market—which is a term used for a designated commodity exchange on which trading in futures is permitted—is prohibited from manipulating or attempting to manipulate the market and is prohibited from making false reports. The penalty for such violations of the act is the taking away of privileges of a member in the market. Section 6 (b) of the present law provides that such penalty can be imposed only when the trader "is violating the provisions of the act." In other words, the present tense is used. Violations must be going on at the time the complaint is filed.

In the well-known case against Arthur W. Cutten this defect in the law became glaringly apparent. In the complaint filed against Cutten in 1934 it was alleged that in 1930 and 1931 he had violated the regulations made pursuant to the Grain Futures Act. He had failed to report to the administration his net position in futures owned and controlled by him in excess of 500,000 bushels of wheat, corn, or oats, and in excess of 200,000 bushels of rye, or barley, as the regulations provided. It was further alleged that in order to evade these regulations he split his trade into 35 accounts and carried some of these accounts in the names of relatives and associates. It was alleged that on 130 days in 1930 and 110 days in 1931 he had trades in a single wheat future equal to or in excess of 500,000 bushels.

It was further alleged that his purpose in concealing his position in the market was to manipulate the price of grain and thereby make large profits.

The Commission found that he had violated these rules and regulations under the Grain Futures Act and that an order should be entered to refuse him trading privileges for a period of 2 years.

An appeal was taken to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, and the case was decided by that court in 1935. A writ of certiorari is now pending in the United States Supreme Court.

The court held that Cutten—

> Repeatedly, knowingly, and intentionally, during the deep depression years of 1930 and 1931, when agriculture was waging its losing battle for existence on account of low and ever lower prices, violated and flouted that provision of the rules and regulations promulgated pursuant to the authority of the statute which required him, as a dealer, to report the fact that he was short more than 500,000 bushels in any one future.

The court held, however, that since the law, as expressed in section 6 (b), is in the present tense, and the wrongdoings complained of were shown to have been committed some 2 years prior to the institution of the proceedings, there was no right to cancel the member's privileges in the market.

In the course of the opinion the court said:

> It is admittedly rather difficult to understand why Congress would, when dealing with the punishment of a board, include past as well as present violations, whereas in section 6 (b) when dealing with the punishment of an individual trader, it provides for punishment only when such person "is violating" or "is attempting to manipulate the market."

For many years the name of Arthur W. Cutten was in the headlines of grain-market news. When business was lagging in the outlying offices of Chicago commission firms, a whisper that Cutten was buying wheat would cause orders to start rolling in from all over the country. Mention was seldom made that Cutten was selling. He was referred to as a "friend of the farmer", always on the buying side, always helping to boost prices. So anxious was he to establish his reputation along these lines that in 1932 he engaged a talented writer, Boyden Sparkes, and published a series of articles in the Saturday Evening Post proclaiming his virtues as a farm benefactor and severely criticizing the Grain Futures Administration because of its interference with his business.

The real nature of his operations was finally disclosed when the Grain Futures Administration, in conducting a general survey of the market in 1932, discovered on the books of commercial houses a number of accounts belonging to Cutten but carried in the names of relatives and friends. A more complete investigation followed and resulted in charges against him for violation in 1930 and 1931 of the Grain Futures Act.

During this period the Federal Farm Board was spending millions of dollars in trying to sustain a fair price for wheat. Readers of his articles in the Saturday Evening Post might have expected Mr. Cutten to assist in this effort of the Farm Board, but during that period he was a consistent short seller. His short sales amounted to more than 73,000,000 bushels. At one time he was short 7,525,000 bushels. In 1930 he was short 79 percent of the time and in 1931, 89 percent of the time.

On February 23, 1930, Secretary Hyde sent him a telegram, as follows:

> It is reported to me that you have been operating on the bear side of the grain market and that these operations have contributed to the collapse of the market. I have no right or authority to suggest any course to any businessman in his own business, but just in the public interest, if you could abandon such a course it would help many thousands of people in a time of distress. If the report is not true, then disregard my anxiety in the matter.

To this telegram Mr. Cutten, on February 25, 1930, replied as follows:

> Your wire received, and your information misleading. I have not been very active in the markets. My activity for the last 2 weeks consisted of selling about 400 privileges each way. I don't think I have sold a bushel of wheat during that time except to protect the trades put.

Now, let us see what the position of Mr. Cutten was at the very time he sent that telegram.

The record shows that on the very day Mr. Cutten sent the above telegram to Secretary Hyde he was short in Chicago wheat futures to the extent of nearly 4,000,000 bushels.

As the law now is, a speculator may go into the market, violate the rules of the exchange and of the Government commission, manipulate the trading, make false reports, corner the market on some commodity, and make millions of dollars in profits; and if he gets all that done before a complaint is filed against him he may escape without any penalty. In the event he is caught he may only be denied the privileges of the market for a period of 2 years. He may very well spend that time cruising in placid waters, enjoy his profits, and be ready for another foray at the end of 2 years.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. That situation is due, as I understand, to the interpretation placed by the court on the existing law; namely, that it is not applicable to past acts, to offenses which have been completed, but only to those which are in progress.

Mr. POPE. The Senator is entirely correct. If the offenses complained of are not taking place at the time the complaint is filed there is no power on the part of the Commission or anybody else to penalize the offender.

The present bill amends the law by making it applicable to past offenses, and enlarges the penalty to a maximum fine of $10,000 and 1 year's imprisonment, besides losing trading privileges in the market. It is thought that the prospect of a year in Federal prison instead of 2 years of balmy ocean breezes for such market manipulations might be considerably less attractive.

On July 19 and 20, 1933, there was a sensational price collapse, in which Chicago wheat futures declined about 25 cents and corn futures 18 cents. The Chicago Exchange was closed. An investigation by the Grain Futures Administration disclosed the fact that this—

> Resulted principally from the activities of not more than 10 traders who control 15 large speculative accounts and gradually accumulated inordinately large holdings of both wheat and corn futures during the week preceding the collapse; that a large portion of these tremendous holdings was suddenly dumped upon the market.

It was found that there were 30 speculative accounts in Chicago wheat futures and 21 in corn futures, each of which amounted to 1,000,000 bushels or more at some time during the period from June 14 to June 31, 1933.

The report of the investigation concludes with this statement:

> This economic catastrophe again demonstrates conclusively that a concentration in large accounts of too great a portion of the total open commitments in grain futures is virtually certain to result in erratic price movements, irrespective of whether such inordinately large accounts be on the long side or the short side of the market.

In other words, the power to engage in unlimited trade on the exchanges permits a few speculators to create widespread disaster throughout the country. In this bill the power is given to the Commodity Exchange Commission, consisting of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Attorney General, to fix limits on the amount of trading under contracts for future delivery. This is contained in section 5 of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will not the Senator go on and enlighten the Senate as to what happened when the authorities undertook to arrest and try the guilty parties under the then existing law? I understand that situation is one of the things which the new bill undertakes to remedy.

Mr. POPE. I will say to the Senator that just a few moments ago, in a colloquy with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], that was brought out, and is in the RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. POPE. Instances of the effect of excessive trading in futures have been observed during the administration of the original act. For instance, in 1931 Thomas M. Howell effected a corner in 1931 July corn. With some associates he accumulated a long interest in corn futures of over 8,000,000 bushels. This amounted to 57 percent of the total July corn contracts. In addition to the purchases of futures, Howell purchased actual corn totaling 322,330 bushels, thus making it more difficult for others to deliver actual corn against his holdings of July futures. He "squeezed" those who had sold the market short, which resulted in a price advance in corn during the last 3 days of July from 58 cents to 72 cents per bushel. This was followed, of course, by a serious price decline. A complaint was filed against him, and his case is now pending in the circuit court of appeals on much the same question of law as was involved in the Cutten case. He claims to have got out of the game just before the complaint was filed.

The amendments contained in this bill would give to the Exchange Commission power to limit such trading, and, in a large measure, prevent such conduct. There is also a provision in the bill giving the Secretary of Agriculture power to extend the time limits within which grain may be delivered on future contracts. The maximum time limit provided in the bill is 10 days. This is found in section 7 of the bill. The obvious purpose of that is to give an opportunity for delivery when there is actually in the warehouses not enough grain to fill the future contracts, where call has been made.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. The limitation as to notice also provides a length of time in which the purchaser may find buyers for his purchases?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. That is very essential, because under the present rule the purchaser has only a day or two, and if he is unable to take the grain within that time, he is penalized, and it is then retendered. This provision is designed to give the purchaser time enough to resell his purchases?

Mr. POPE. Yes; the Senator is quite correct. That provision also is in the present bill.

HEDGING EXEMPTED

Bona-fide hedging transactions are exempted from the limitations as to the amount of such trading, and bona fide hedging transactions are defined to mean "sales of any commodity for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any board of trade to the extent that such sales are offset in quantity by the ownership or purchase of the same cash commodity, or conversely, purchases of any commodity for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any board of trade to the extent that such purchases are offset by sales of the same cash commodity."

The important thing in that connection is that on one side or the other of these transactions exists a cash commodity, and as the cash commodity is necessarily limited in amount, the future trading would be limited to the amount of the cash commodity.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I was not present in the committee when the bill was being considered, and I should like to ask the Senator whether he means to say that no limit on the amount of hedges placed against the ownership of the actual physical property is proposed?

Mr. POPE. Yes; that is exactly the effect of the bill.

Mr. SMITH. At the proper time, when the bill is being considered, I think a limitation should be provided. I do not desire to take the Senator's time now, but it is inevitable both in the textile and grain markets that individual firms may own such a vast amount of grain, actual physical grain, or cotton as to have practical control of the market. Therefore I think the bill should be amended so that there may be a greater number of actual bona fide hedges against the ownership of the actual commodity, but that also should be limited.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, the definition in the bill does not materially change the present law, but it makes it more specific.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIPSTEAD in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POPE. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. I think it desirable at this point in the Senator's discussion to emphasize that the bill does not seek to interfere with legitimate business transactions. The desire is to permit large processors to buy the actual grain they may need in their business and to sell hedges against that grain. The bill seeks further to limit them to their actual needs in respect to their operations.

Mr. POPE. In this amendment ownership of a commodity is declared to include byproducts and commodities to be raised within 12 months on land owned or leased by the hedger. That is a rather interesting interpretation of ownership.

There is a difference of opinion as to the value of hedging in the marketing of commodities. It is safe to say, however, that most of those who engage in these transactions strongly support the practice as a means of protection for those who purchase or sell large quantities of such commodities for future delivery. It is widely claimed that this practice stabilizes the market price of such commodities and affords needed protection.

The Grain Futures Administration is of the opinion that hedging properly defined and limited is a legitimate protection against the risks from fluctuation in commodity prices. It does not involve speculation to any undesired extent, and the public is not injured. It is pointed out that when the exchanges were closed during the war, fluctuations in price were great and there was no protection against the risks taken. It is further pointed out that prices paid to the actual producers of commodities are necessarily lower because dealers in these commodities are required to protect themselves by paying lower prices to the producers. It is claimed such hedgers have no interest in manipulating the market or influencing commodity prices. This is the reason why hedging is excepted from the limitations that may be placed upon purely speculative trading.

REGISTRATION OF BROKERS REQUIRED

This bill further provides for the registration of commission merchants and floor brokers, and power is given to the Secretary of Agriculture to revoke or suspend any such merchant or broker from activity in the market. Certain requirements are exacted of them in the way of reports to the Secretary of Agriculture and the keeping of books and records pertaining to their transactions. The present law does not contain these provisions. They are desirable.

PROTECTS MARGIN DEPOSITS

In the administration of the original act, it has developed that margins paid by buyers and sellers to commission merchants have been intermingled with the funds of these merchants, and have been used by them in the conduct of their own business. They have not been held intact for the benefit of the traders. It further appears that certain favored dealers have not been required actually to put up the money for margins, and have been extended credit in that respect. This gives these favored dealers an advantage. In some instances, large commission firms have become bankrupt and the funds placed with them by a large number of dealers were lost.

In October 1935 the E. F. Carlston Co., commission merchants, of Minneapolis, discontinued business. This company withdrew from the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce, thus placing itself outside of the reach of the Grain Futures Administration. It refused to permit an examination of its books. Farmers and country elevator companies had deposited margins in a large amount. This company had used the funds, commingled them with its own money, and, when the company failed, there was a loss of most of the money so deposited. It was testified the other day at the hearings that an offer of some 30 cents on the dollar was made recently by this company to the depositors. The same situation existed in the failure of the Rosenbaum Grain Co., of Chicago, which held margins of approximately $750,000.

This practice is prohibited by the pending bill.

In section 44, subdivision 2, this measure provides that any commission merchant, in soliciting or accepting orders for the purchase or sale of any commodity for future delivery, "shall, whether a member or nonmember of the contract market, treat and deal with all money, securities, and property received by such person to margin, guarantee, or secure the trades or contracts of any customer of such person, or accruing to such customer, as a result of such trades or contracts, as belonging to such customer."

This section further provides that "such money, securities, and property shall not be used to margin or guarantee the trades or contracts or to secure or extend the credit of any customer or person other than the one for whom the same are held."

The section goes on to provide, however, that any such customers' deposits may be commingled with the deposits of other such customers and may be withdrawn by the commission merchant and applied to the payment of commissions, brokerage, interest, taxes, storage, and other charges lawfully accruing in connection with such contracts and trades, but the bill does not prohibit such customers' deposits from being intermingled with the funds of the commission merchant as the bill now stands and as it came from the House of Representatives.

The Secretary of Agriculture, in his letter to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, suggested that this language be changed so as to permit the commingling of customers' deposits with each other, but prohibiting any commingling of such deposits with the money of the commission merchant.

This amendment to the present bill would seem to be desirable, and it will be offered at the proper time. I have consulted with a number of the members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and they have approved the amendment. It seems to me desirable that the funds of the commission merchant be kept entirely separate from the deposits of the customers.

PROHIBITED FRAUDULENT PRACTICES

Under the administration of the original Grain Futures Act certain transactions have been found that lend themselves to cheating or fraudulent practices.

In section 4 (b) of the bill it is made unlawful, generally, to cheat, make false reports, deceive by any means, or handle bucket orders on the futures market, and in section 4 (c) specified practices are prohibited. These practices are called wash sales, cross trades, accommodation trades, privileges, indemnities, bids, offers, puts, calls, advance guaranties, and decline guaranties.

Wash sales are pretended sales made openly in the pit or trading place for the purpose of deceiving other traders. They are employed to give a false appearance of trading and to cause prices to be registered which are not true prices. They may be entered and recorded as real trades, but by agreement between the parties privately are either canceled or washed out by other trades.

For example, Floor Broker A, wishing to buy May wheat when the market is 95 cents per bushel, will offer May wheat at 94⅞ or 94¾, being sure that his confederate, B, gets the sale. Such sales may induce bona-fide offers at the lower prices, whereupon A turns buyer. In the meantime his fictitious sales are forgotten or washed out by offsetting trades.

Cross trades are fictitious trades recorded and cleared through the exchange clearing house as real trades. They are a device commonly employed by floor brokers for becoming buyers in respect to selling orders of customers, and vice versa. They take the form of a recorded double purchase and sale between two brokers. Each broker is recorded as having bought from and sold to the other the same quantity of the same future at the same price.

For example, Broker A is put down as seller to Broker B for 5,000 bushels of May wheat at a dollar a bushel and is also put down as buyer from B of 5,000 bushels at a dollar a bushel. The transaction appears to be without purpose and without effect; but A, having made an actual sale of 5,000 bushels of May wheat for a customer, at, say, $1.01, reports to his commission firm that the customer's order has been executed at a dollar. Thereupon he switches the sold side of his own dollar cross trade for the actual $1.01 sale for the customer, and takes a profit for himself of the 1-cent difference which should have been added to the sale price for the customer. In this example, of course, it is assumed that there is a 1-cent fluctuation in price while the customer's order is in the hands of the floor broker, and before he reports execution. That sort of thing is prohibited by this bill.

An accommodation trade is a transaction between two commission houses whereby, one being long with the clearing house and the other being short, the one that is long sells to the one that is short enough of a given future to give each house an even or nearly even position, thus reducing the amount of the margin to be put up with the clearing house. At some later date another transaction is made, unwinding and undoing the first transaction. In the meantime, each house has had free use of the margin money put up by its customers without having to redeposit it with the clearing house. Clearing houses require margins only on net positions, so that where a commission firm has customers both long and short in equal or nearly equal positions, the firm as such has little or no net position with the clearing house. Such a practice would also be prohibited.

Privileges, indemnities, bids, offers, puts, and calls are option contracts wherein, for a relatively small money consideration, the buyer of a privilege or indemnity obtains the right during the next day or during the next week to buy or sell, as the case may be, a stated amount of a given commodity for future delivery at a then stipulated price. A privileged contract giving the buyer the right to sell is called a bid or a put, and the right given to buy is called an offer or a call.

For example, for $6.25 one may, after the market closes one day, buy a bid good the next day entitling him to sell 5,000 bushels of May wheat at, say, 95 cents. The market may have closed at 96 cents. After it opens up the next day at, say, 94 cents, or sells at 94 cents at any time during that day, the buyer of the bid will buy 5,000 bushels of May wheat at 94 cents and exercise his bid option to sell at 95 cents, thus making a profit of $50—less commission—on a $6.25 investment. An offer or call is exactly the reverse of this process.

In advance or decline guaranties, the seller of the contract guarantees to make good the difference between the stipulated price and the price at which some named future sells at any time the buyer may select during the specified period.

It can readily be seen that all these practices are pure gambling, just as the running of a bucket shop, and they are prohibited by this bill. In examining the reports of the Grain Futures Commission during the past several years, I have been surprised to find the large extent to which certain speculators on the exchanges have been engaged in these practices. At times it has run as high as 90 percent of all the business done by a speculator during a given period. All fictitious transactions are prohibited by this bill.

PROTECTION FOR COOPERATIVES

This measure would afford protection to cooperative associations of producers, as provided in section 9 on page 22 of the bill. The present law requires the admission to contract markets of cooperative associations complying with certain statutory conditions. The amendment would prevent the arbitrary suspension or expulsion from membership of such cooperatives by commodity exchanges; and it would not be possible to deprive cooperatives of the rights and privileges of contract market membership pending action by the Commission or the courts. The bill proposes to amend the present act so that the rights of cooperative associations on exchanges shall be expressly preserved pending such appeal.

It is well known that the commodity exchanges are, as a rule, hostile toward cooperative associations of producers; and under the present law a charge, however baseless, might be lodged against a cooperative, and it would be suspended from trading on the exchange pending the determination of an appeal, which might last 2 or 3 years. Since considerable time might elapse before the charge could be disposed of, substantial losses might be incurred by the cooperative, when often the charges might be baseless.

CEASE AND DESIST ORDER AUTHORIZED

Under the present act, the penalty for its violation by a commodity exchange is the suspension or revocation of contract market designation by the Commission created by the Grain Futures Act. The imposition of such penalty would penalize innocent producers by closing their markets. This situation would be remedied by the present bill, which provides that in lieu of revoking the designation of a contract market, which would have the effect of closing the market, the Commission may direct the market to cease and desist from its violation of the act in the particular complained of; failure of the market to comply with such cease and desist order subjecting it to a fine of not more than $10,000, or its officers to imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both such fine and imprisonment.

This amendment to the present act would seem to be wholly desirable in the interest of the producers and traders utilizing the exchange.

SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE TO PROCEED AGAINST VIOLATORS

Under the provisions of section 6 (a) of the present act, trading privileges on contract markets may be denied to violators of the act only by order of the Commission created by the act. The bill amends this section so as to empower the Secretary of Agriculture to proceed against violators other than a contract market, and thus obviate the necessity of convoking a commission composed of three members of the President's Cabinet. This would expedite the administration of the law, and would remove from consideration a number of individual infractions of regulations for trading on the exchange.

SUGGESTED AMENDMENTS

The Secretary of Agriculture has suggested two other important amendments to the present bill. On page 19, following subparagraph (6) of section 5 (a), it is suggested that another subparagraph be added and designated as (7). This amendment to the present bill will be offered at the proper time. It would read as follows:

(7) Require that receipts issued under the United States Warehouse Act (U. S. C. title VII, secs. 241–273) shall be accepted in satisfaction of any futures contract made on or subject to the rules of such contract market without discrimination, and notwithstanding that the warehouseman issuing such receipts is not also licensed as a warehouseman under the laws of any State or enjoys other or different privileges than under State law: Provided, however, That such receipts shall be for the kind, quality, and quantity of commodities specified in such contract, and that the warehouse in which the commodity is stored meets such reasonable requirements as may be imposed by such contract market on other warehouses as to location, accessibility, and suitability for warehousing and delivery purposes.

The purpose of this amendment is to give the privileges of the United States Warehouse Act to customers of the exchanges who are not licensed under the warehouse laws of the State in which the exchange is located. It is believed that the United States Warehouse Act gives ample protection to all who are connected with the exchange, and that the imposition of discriminations against customers is unfair, and works to the disadvantage of the customers and to the public generally.

This has to do particularly with wheat, to which reference was made a few moments ago, because in State-licensed warehouses oftentimes there is not enough storage capacity to comply with the demand for actual delivery at the end of a month.

The other important amendment proposed by the Secretary of Agriculture has to do with subsection (2) of section 6 (a), appearing on page 23 of the present bill. It is a substitute for subsection (2) and provides that—

No rule of any board of trade designated as a contract market shall forbid or be construed to forbid the payment of compensation on a commodity basis or otherwise by any federated cooperative association to its regional member association for services rendered or to be rendered in connection with any organization work, educational activity, or procurement of patronage, provided no part of any such compensation is returned to patrons (whether members or nonmembers) of such cooperative association, or of its regional or local member associations, otherwise than as a dividend on capital stock or as a patronage dividend out of the net earnings or surplus of such cooperative association.

As the bill now stands subsection (2) is not quite clear because of the use of the words "producer patrons", and might permit compensation to be returned to patrons of such cooperative association and would amount to a rebate to the seller of commodities to such association.

This sort of purchasing, that is where rebates are allowed, would be unfair to other members of the exchange, and would probably produce a chaotic condition in the market. It does seem fair and reasonable to permit the payment of compensation to regional member associations by the federated cooperative association on a commodity unit basis. The services of such regional associations are valuable and compensation is reasonable, but to give some portion of this compensation to the customers of the regionals does not seem either fair or reasonable. It is this point with which the Secretary's amendment deals and makes clear. I expect this amendment also to be offered to the bill at the proper time.

The present Grain Futures Act has been upheld as to its constitutionality by the Supreme Court in several cases. The regulations contained in it have been held to affect the national public interest and have been held to fall within a proper regulation of interstate commerce.

The amendments contained in this bill and those suggested by the Secretary of Agriculture, to which I have referred, would seem very clearly to fall within the decisions of the Supreme Court upholding the constitutionality of the original act.

It may be interesting to observe that of the total volume of future trading in all commodities on all markets in the United States, about 70 percent is in grains and about 20 percent in cotton. Trading in wheat futures accounts for about 85 percent of the trading in all grains and about 64 percent of the trading at Chicago in wheat. About 99 percent of the trading in grain futures takes place at four markets, Chicago, Kansas City, Minneapolis, and Duluth. The annual volume of trading in all grains on the Chicago Board of Trade is from eleven to twenty-eight billion bushels per year. In the case of wheat the volume of trading in futures is from six to sixteen billion bushels or from 8 to 24 times the size of the United States crop. Speculation and hedging orders flow into the Chicago market from all parts of the world. The trading is largely speculative. Only a small percentage of the volume of trading represents hedging transactions. It has been suggested that only 5 percent of the trading in futures is in hedging transactions.

Less than 1 percent, on the average, of contracts for the future delivery of wheat on the Chicago Board of Trade are settled by delivery. Hedgers use the market only for protection purposes and do not ordinarily make deliveries.

In a survey conducted by the Grain Futures Administration as of September 29, 1934, it was found something like 18,000 persons had a market interest in the wheat or cotton futures on the Chicago Board of Trade. Nearly 2,000 of these were classified as farmers. It is interesting to note, however, that all occupations are represented, including bakers, bankers, cooks, clergymen, doctors, hog buyers, hostesses, jewelers, lawyers, nurses, pugilists, plasterers, seamen, scientists, waitresses, and watchmakers.

Investigation of the Grain Futures Administration indicates that it is the small traders—those who take positions in the market of less than 100,000 bushels—that not only absorb the hedging sales but who furnish the real support for future trading in grains. In the main their trading is so diffused and scattered that as a body they lend a stabilizing influence.

In the September 29 survey it was found that the long interest in Chicago wheat futures of 146,000,000 bushels was held by approximately 10,000 traders and the short interest of the same amount was held by approximately 3,500 traders. This means that there were 10,000 traders holding an average long interest of 15,000 bushels and 3,500 traders holding an average short interest of 32,000 bushels. There is a widespread public interest attached to the business of future trading. The very nature of the business is such as to make it fraught with temptation for those who are disposed to take unfair advantage. In no other business is there found the same combination of circumstances and profit possibilities to tempt the unscrupulous.

It is the purpose of this bill to reduce to a minimum the possibility of unscrupulous trading and to permit the benefits of such trading to be obtained by those entitled to them.

There can be no defense for such fraudulent practices as have been pointed out in transactions in these grain exchanges. The present law does not reach them. These markets are extremely sensitive. A false or misleading statement or fictitious trading may in a few minutes turn thousands of dollars into the pocket of some unscrupulous trader, as illustrated by the example I gave a few moments ago. At the same time it may cause millions of dollars in loss to farmers and others affected by a fictitious price movement. Large speculators may temporarily upset the whole price structure.

The Grain Futures Administration has found in the case of Chicago wheat futures, speculative lines, either long or short, in excess of 2,000,000 bushels are a threat to market stability. There have been within the last few years and since the passage of the original Grain Futures Act, speculative lines in excess of 10,000,000 bushels held by a single individual.

At best, with all the safeguards possible to be thrown around transactions in futures, these market exchanges possess possibilities of manipulation to the advantage of the shrewd and unscrupulous trader with corresponding loss to the thousands of producers who are innocent victims.

If it be true that there are advantages in commodity exchanges, that the price to the farmer is stabilized by bona fide hedging transactions, and other proper forms of trading, it certainly cannot be contended that fraudulent, fictitious, and cheating practices are justified from any standpoint. The farmer has enough difficulties, enough discriminations against him, enough suffering as the result of natural obstacles to his industry, without subjecting him to manipulations of his commodity markets by unscrupulous and cheating operators on the grain exchanges in this country.

I trust this bill will be passed by the Senate at the earliest possible date.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS IN PITTSBURGH, PA.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I wish to make a further statement regarding an article from the Pittsburgh Press of April 14 concerning registration of voters in Pittsburgh which was introduced on April 20 by my colleague [Mr. GUFFEY].

On April 21 I said in reference to this article:

My colleague asserts that the article in the Pittsburgh Press shows how the Republican lead in registration has been reduced. Having read the article carefully and observing the statistics given, I fail to see any explanation as to how the reduction in the Republican registration was accomplished.

I now have discovered why by reading the material which my colleague introduced into the RECORD I was unable to find an explanation of this change in registration. I find that the explanatory part of this news article was omitted. I wish now to read the part which was omitted, and to ask that that article in full be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The Pittsburgh Press, notably friendly to the administration, explains the change of registration, as follows:

Under pressure to qualify themselves to vote for Mayor William N. McNair and some of his satellites for Democratic nominations in the primary election, hundreds of city employees changed their registration from Republican to Democratic during the last few days.

The employees have been pushed back and forth between the two parties in the last 2 years so much that they are dizzy. In the State fight 2 years ago it was reported that the city administration exerted pressure on the employees to favor the Republican candidates for Governor and United States Senator. And now has come the pressure in the opposite direction.

The switching of the party registration of city employees has been particularly marked in the Thirty-second Congressional District, where Mayor McNair is a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Congress and Public Safety Director Thomas A. Dunn is running for Democratic national delegate. It has been only slightly less in the Thirty-third District, in which Supplies Director John J. Murry is a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Congress and City Assessor William B. Foster is seeking election as a national delegate.

When introducing the statistics from the news article of the Pittsburgh Press and leaving out the explanatory part which I have just read, my colleague said that he wished to introduce "a clipping" from the Press. His reference appears to have been most apt, indeed, when one reflects on the part which was clipped out. Doubtless he can explain the reason for this clipping better than anyone else.

While the Pittsburgh Press is well known to be friendly to the administration, I have observed that it has followed the old journalistic adage to "print all the news that is fit to print", and in this particular instance credit should be given to the Pittsburgh Press for printing both sides of the story. The fact of the matter is that, in a day when most of us read at least two newspapers, little is to be gained by attempting deliberately to mislead the public.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be printed in the RECORD.

The article is as follows:

[From the Pittsburgh Press of Apr. 14, 1936]

VOTE CHANGES INCREASE LEAD OF DEMOCRATS—BOOKS FOR PRIMARY ELECTION CLOSED WITH G. O. P. BEHIND BY 4,173—1,600 SWITCH PARTIES—NCNAIR CAMPAIGN GIVEN AS REASON FOR MANY POLITICAL SHIFTS

The Democratic lead in the registration of Pittsburgh voters was 4,173 when the books for the primary election were closed last night. No additional registrations or changes in enrollment from one party to another can take place in the city until after the primary.

The final totals of the major parties were:

Democratic, 130,285.

Republican, 126,112.

The score for yesterday was 1,562 changes from Republican to Democratic registration, and only 101 from Democratic to Republican.

HUGE GAIN MADE

The Democratic registration of 1932 in Pittsburgh, the year President Roosevelt was elected, was only 19,702. The Republican registration was 208,161 in that year.

Democrats, therefore, have gained 110,583 in Pittsburgh registration in 4 years and Republicans have lost 82,049.

Under pressure to qualify themselves to vote for Mayor William N. McNair and some of his satellites for Democratic nominations in the primary election, hundreds of city employees changed their registration from Republican to Democratic during the last few days.

The employees have been pushed back and forth between the two parties in the last 2 years so much that they are dizzy. In the State fight 2 years ago the McNair administration drove on the employees in favor of the Republican candidates for Governor and United States Senator. The same thing occurred last year in the interest of Republican candidates for county offices. And now has come the pressure in the opposite direction.

M'NAIR A CANDIDATE

The switching of the party registration of city employees has been particularly marked in the Thirty-second Congressional District, where Mayor McNair is a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Congress and Public Safety Director Thomas A. Dunn is running for Democratic national delegate. It has been only slightly less in the Thirty-third District, in which Supplies Director John J. Murray is a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Congress and City Assessor William B. Foster is seeking election as a national delegate.

The Republican lead in registration in the entire county has been cut to 50,906. Four years ago Republicans topped the Democrats by 375,467. County registrations then were: Republicans, 425,121; Democratic, 49,654.

The registration for the entire county now is divided as follows: Republican, 325,964; Democratic, 275,058.

THE WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Sharon Herald of April 24 entitled "Relief Money Well Spent", in which a fine tribute is paid to the W. P. A. orchestra in this community. This article came to my desk this morning, and in view of the many charges of "boondoggling" which are made I desire to show the other side of the picture. Sharon is a community close to my heart. I lived there during the early years of my life and my parents maintained residence there for over half a century. The people of Sharon are substantial, hard-working, fine-spirited citizens, and I know that the words of praise of the W. P. A. orchestra there represent a general community appreciation of what the Government is doing not alone for music but for actors, artists, and others of similar talents.

On April 24 the junior Senator from New York, during a time when I was not present on the Senate floor, introduced a number of telegrams regarding the W. P. A. theater project of New York City. Two of these telegrams were from Mr. Frank Gillmore, president of the Actors' Equity Association, whom I know. I wrote a somewhat extended letter to Mr. Gillmore, explaining the speech which I made on April 20 on the floor of the Senate regarding this issue. I ask that this letter be printed herewith.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the editorial and letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial and letter are as follows:

[From the Sharon (Pa.) Herald of Apr. 24, 1936]

RELIEF MONEY WELL SPENT

If there were any in the audience who had scoffed at the W. P. A. project for unemployed musicians, actors, artists, and others of similar talents, they must have been greatly surprised and made to feel considerably ashamed of themselves by the district W. P. A. orchestra's concert in the high-school auditorium last night.

For the concert was top-notch in every way, reflecting great credit upon the musicians and their director, Ben Shulansky, of New Castle, formerly of Sharon.

Certainly money spent to advance the arts is not wasted if it is productive of the fine results evidenced by the district orchestra in its appearance here. It would be a topsy-turvy world if we all had to swing picks and wield shovels; also if we all were musicians. Both are needed to balance our lives, and those who heard the W. P. A. concert could not doubt that they received a greater benefit than many other district relief projects have afforded.

Let us have more music, theater, and art projects if such excellent results are to be obtained.

APRIL 25, 1936.

Mr. FRANK GILLMORE,
President, Actors' Equity Association,
45 West Forty-seventh Street, New York.

DEAR GILLMORE: Yesterday the junior Senator from New York, Mr. WAGNER, presented two telegrams from you in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, together with a number of others. These telegrams are found on pages 6074–6075 of the RECORD for April 24.

In the course of his remarks Senator WAGNER said that I had criticized the Federal theater project of the Works Progress Administration. I suggest that you read through the brief speech which I made on this subject found on pages 5696–5699 of the RECORD of April 20. If you read my speech carefully, you will observe that I offered no personal criticism of the project as such whatsoever.

I introduced letters written by Mr. Norman L. Marks, counsel, and Mr. Adolph Pinkus, president of the Federal Theatre Veterans League, which had been addressed to President Roosevelt on March 19, together with a letter written by Mr. E. J. Blunkall. I made no reference to Mr. Blunkall in connection with the Actors' Equity Association, and in the letter which was inserted in the RECORD over his name no reference of this kind was made.

These letters criticized the theater project because of alleged communistic activities within it. I made no personal accusation against the project because I have no personal knowledge of it. I did quote from the writings of Mrs. Hallie Flanagan, who is the director of the project. I made no personal criticism of Mrs. Flanagan because I do not know her personally. I quoted from her writings, showing that as late as 1934 she had severely condemned the American plan of life and had idealized communism.

I called attention to page 81 of Mrs. Flanagan's book of 1928, entitled "Shifting Scenes", in which she eulogizes the Russian theater, saying "I became absorbed by the drama outside the theater; the strange, stirring, and glorious drama that is Russia." Of Mrs. Flanagan's writings I said on April 20: "Anyone reading these books, either casually or carefully, would find no place in which Mrs. Flanagan has a good word to say about the United States, this Government, American institutions, or the economic system which still makes possible relief money for the Works Progress Administration. From reading these books one gains the impression that Russia is a grand place and that the United States is terrible. Mrs. Flanagan's idea of the country in which she directs the theater project of the Works Progress Administration is found in her play, the American Plan, where business is caricatured, communistic violence made to seem inevitable, and class conflict necessary." Then I said, "If these are not Mrs. Flanagan's actual sentiments, I believe the country would welcome a statement from her to the contrary." I have not heard from her as yet.

I hope in the interest of fair play for the Works Progress Administration and in justice to herself that if Mrs. Flanagan did not write these books, or if they were merely an artistic presentation of a chance whim on her part, or if she did write them but has since changed her mind on these issues, or if she has written books other than the four listed under her name in the Library of Congress, in which she presents different points of view, that she will bring these facts to the attention of the American public. If she wishes additional representation on this subject, or if she believes that she has been unfairly represented, I would gladly introduce a statement from her to the Senate. I have no desire to injure the reputation of anyone.

I suggested in my speech on the Senate floor April 20 that those responsible for the appointment of Mrs. Flanagan should address a letter to the Presiding Officer of the Senate explaining the reasons for her appointment. I presume that Mr. Harry Hopkins, Administrator of the Works Progress Administration, was responsible for her appointment, and yet I cannot say this to be true, because I do not know. I did not ask Mr. Hopkins to explain her appointment to me because he has not as yet answered other inquiries which I have directed to him some weeks ago. On the matter of her appointment I said: "The question arises as to why she was appointed to administer over $7,000,000 of American money under the Works Progress Administration, when all of her published works reveal, as she says, that she has become 'absorbed in the glorious drama that is Russia.' Was she so appointed because the Administration approves her point of view? If the administration appointed her without knowing her point of view, it reveals unbelievable irresponsibility. If the administration appointed her as a mark of approval and a sanction on her absorption in the 'glorious drama that is Russia', it should now explain to the taxpayers of this country the use of relief money intended to feed the hungry for such alien purposes."

Knowing you as I do, Mr. Gillmore, I am sure that you are not a Communist. Therefore, you would have little or no interest in trying to divert American money to spread communistic propaganda in this country, through the theater or otherwise. I know the high ideals and fine American principles for which the Actors' Equity Association stands.

I also know that Senator WAGNER is not a Communist. Certainly he would not wish to place his endorsement on the use of work-relief money for the spread of communism. You will note in his remarks on the theater project of April 24 he makes no reference whatsoever to the issue of communism. As you read over my statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD you will observe that this was the one and only issue which I raised as far as the Federal Theater project was concerned. I spoke solely about using the project for the purpose of spreading communistic propaganda. I made no personal observations about this issue because I have no personal knowledge of it. I simply introduced such evidence as has come to me and asked to be informed on this subject by those who had administrative responsibility for this project. The evidence which I presented seemed trustworthy. It was specific. If the charges there presented are untrue, they should be proven to be false. If they are true—and I have no evidence to the contrary as yet—only an unbiased Senate investigation of the entire Works Progress Administration will actually explain this situation. Doubtless you are aware of the fact that over 7 weeks ago I presented a resolution in the Senate asking for such an investigation.

In my speech of April 20 I made no statement whatsoever as to how I thought the theater project should be administered. The telegrams which Senator WAGNER introduced in the RECORD did not touch on this subject at all. Therefore, as far as I am concerned and until I receive additional evidence, my thought on this subject remains just as it was on April 20, because I have heard from neither Mrs. Flanagan or Mr. Hopkins concerning the use of the Federal theater project for communistic purposes.

As you know, Mr. Gillmore, I have known the great men and women of the stage. During my early days I associated with many of them. I delighted to sing and upon occasion could do something with the clarinet. In my younger days I became well acquainted with the popular stage favorites of those days—the gay nineties and later. I know the American actor and I understand his point of view. The actors whom I have known have been great patriots, true to their country and lovers of the American way of life. I was truly shocked when evidence was presented to me which pointed to the fact that those now directing the American theater project are not professional stage people and that questions have been raised about their national allegiance.

I am sure that American actors and those who encourage the advancement of young American amateurs such as Major Bowes desire to protect American ideals and the American principles of government. You may be sure, Mr. Gillmore, that what the Government is now trying to do for the fine folk of the theater is but an indication of what will be done in an even more substantial way if the American way of life prevails.

Permit me to call attention to the fact that the Federal Theater Veterans League did not ask for the abandonment of the Federal theater project. The veterans asked that those who direct these American Government activities be American in principle. I believe the taxpayers of America would vote for their request "that the theater project be used to produce art, education, and drama and not to disseminate communistic propaganda", notwithstanding the fact that Senator WAGNER introduced a telegram in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on April 24 signed by Mr. Morris Watson, vice president of the American Newspaper Guild, stating: "Protest reading of Federal Theater Veterans League petition on Senate floor as untrue and not representative of veterans' viewpoint." If I know anything about the American Legion or the Veterans of Foreign Wars, they are not willing to advocate the use of American taxpayers' money for the spread of alien propaganda.

You will note, Mr. Gillmore, if you read the telegrams on page 6308 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for April 24 that of all the telegrams introduced by Senator WAGNER, only one had any defense to offer of Mrs. Flanagan. This one was signed by a college professor, Mr. S. M. Tucker, of the Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn. Mr. Tucker wired: "Urge you to use your influence to keep Federal theater project under control of present set-up at Washington with Mrs. Flanagan and not to turn it over to State or city of New York. Project is doing splendid work. Any change of administration would certainly ruin everything. I speak from complete knowledge of the situation. I have no personal connection with the project and appeal only as playgoer, teacher, dramatic critic." I do not know Prof. S. M. Tucker, but of the entire 23 telegrams which Senator WAGNER read into the RECORD only one advocated the retention of Mrs. Flanagan. In view of the fact that my remarks on the Senate floor pertained solely to the use of the project for communistic purposes and not at all to the question of State control of its administration, I noticed an absence of comment on this one point at issue.

You may be sure, Mr. Gillmore, that I do not wish to see Federal money for the American theater stopped. My idea has always been that the American theater should be given every possible support so that its services might build up American art and education.

I sincerely hope that the blight of communism will not destroy the confidence of the taxpayers in the Federal Works Progress Administration theater project in New York City.

I know how generous actors are. The great professional actors of America have given their services time without number for charitable cause of all kinds. Now they need the help of the Government and I shall do everything in my power to help them in their time of need.

Feeling as I do you can imagine my indignation when I was informed that Federal theater project money is being paid to people who have never had anything to do with the theater while professional actors walk the streets. If this is the actual situation it should be investigated and stopped at once. If it is not true, I ask you to write me a detailed account of the actual situation.

I know of the long years of struggle which you have made for the development of a real trade union for American actors. I know how you have joined in the great task of establishing the principle of collective bargaining. I honor you for the work you have done. Knowing you and the principles for which you stand as I do, I have written you at length so that you may understand that what concerns American stage and theater folks vitally concerns me. I desire the American theater to get a fair deal.

Most cordially yours,

JAMES J. DAVIS.

EFFECTS OF NEW DEAL POLICIES

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, again we say, "America must choose." It is with interest that I read the statement of Mr. Harper Sibley, of the United States Chamber of Commerce, that there is amazing improvement in American business. Then I read of the dividends paid by a number of our larger industries. After satisfying myself with reference to the genuineness of this improvement, then I read the last report of the American Federation of Labor, showing that labor conditions are not improved and that some 12,000,000 men are still out of work. Then I read the testimony of Mr. Harry Hopkins for new relief demands of a billion five hundred million dollars, which I understand now will probably be increased another billion, if not two more billion, to be added to the present burdens of the American taxpayer.

Can it be that greater efficiency in production permits the production of goods on a more profitable basis and with less labor? Are we being led into more profitable business with less labor employed? In other words, more riches for the rich and more hardship for the poor.

This leads me to inquire whether or not our present system of borrowing and spending is helpful or harmful. We find that Federal funds are the real impetus behind the improvement in steel, automobile, and other major industries. We find that the distribution of the taxpayer's money is having a beneficial effect upon the consumers' goods industry, but is there anything really permanent about the progress we are now making? Or are we being satisfied today by a system that will impoverish us on the morrow? Will the economy of scarcity ever relieve the depression?

At this point I desire to insert in the RECORD excerpts from a speech delivered by me at Mount Vernon, Iowa, on November 4, 1935, on "Agriculture and Its Future."

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As against the ideas expounded in Secretary Wallace's America Must Choose, let me cite to you two other studies which reach quite different conclusions regarding this problem. One is called America's Capacity to Consume, and is issued by the impartial, scientific organization known as the Brookings Institution in Washington. The other is the Department of Agriculture's own Circular No. 296, published in November 1933, just 6 months after Messrs. Wallace and Tugwell took office, but of which, it is quite obvious, they have never heard. Representing years of patient research, it is one of the most important documents ever issued by the Government.

For here is set forth, carefully analyzed by different classes of population, the future food requirements of the Nation. Both these authorities reach the conclusion that the real problem of agriculture today is not overproduction, but underconsumption. We are so accustomed to thinking of America as a land of plenty that it is difficult to believe that half the people live below a minimum dietary standard; and that, were these normal needs supplied, we should be faced with almost a famine in many important foodstuffs. Yet such is the fact—a fact which certainly cannot be reconciled with a program of curtailment.

Outlined in the Department's circular are three diets: One of moderate cost, mind you, for the average person who works, calling for a per capita food supply of 1,655 pounds annually; one of minimum cost, necessary for health, requiring 1,233 pounds of food; and an emergency diet, needed for life itself, of 959 pounds.

When these quantities are multiplied by 125,000,000 persons, the food required for the American people each year reaches truly amazing proportions. But the important part of these computations is that, for even a prosperous year like 1928, the entire food production of the United States failed to meet the needs of this moderate-cost diet by over 20,000,000,000 pounds, and exceeded the Nation's minimum requirements by only 30,000,000,000 pounds.

If this was the condition at a time when there was little industrial unemployment, then what must it be today, after 6 years of depression? The problem now is no longer one of mere underconsumption but of actual and serious undernourishment for literally millions of our citizens. In the face of this appalling situation, which is being confirmed daily by public health officials, does placing farm production under further restrictions appear to be the course of wisdom and common sense?

Already from the great cities come reports of protests by angry housewives against rising food prices. There are increasing murmurs of discontent among those on relief as to the inadequacy of food provided. The prediction is made that during the months immediately ahead the cost of living will advance still further. While there can be no such thing as starvation in a rich country like ours, yet this winter literally millions of men, women, and children will be forced to go hungry because of this foolish—yes, almost criminal—destruction of crops and livestock directed by the administration.

I regret that there is not sufficient time today to discuss more thoroughly, with the attention that it deserves, this question of prospective food shortages, as forecast by the Department of Agriculture itself. For purposes of illustration, two examples must suffice. The figures I cite are taken from a study made by one of America's leading agricultural experts, Dr. Charles W. Burkett, formerly editor of the American Agriculturist, until recently owned by Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau.

In 1900 our per-capita consumption of beef was 68 pounds; in 1910, 71 pounds; in 1920, 63 pounds. But in 1930, owing to shortage and high prices, the amount of beef consumed dropped to 50 pounds, while this year the estimate is in the neighborhood of 45 pounds. Under the dietary standard set up by circular 296, the minimum requirement per person is 56 pounds. On this basis, the Nation is faced with an actual shortage of more than 2,000,000,000 pounds. Nor must we forget the fact that since 1915 we have been importing in meats the equivalent of nearly 1,000,000 head of livestock annually. In terms of American grazing land lying idle, this equals 10,000,000 acres.

Next, let us take corn, in which Iowa has such a decided interest. Forty percent of the corn crop is annually consumed in pork production. Yet Dr. Burkett declares: "Pork production this year cannot possibly run over six-tenths of the 1929 production, or 4,875,000,000 pounds measured in retail cuts. Instead, therefore, of an excess of 294,000,000 pounds, based on population, to reach the average consumption as laid down by the Department of Agriculture, we shall be faced with a shortage of more than 3,000,000,000 pounds."

With this shortage in hogs now prevailing, another interesting question is raised to which the A. A. A., in its omniscience, has not yet supplied the answer: What is the farmer to do with this year's corn crop? If any proof is needed that supply and demand still govern corn prices, rather than the Secretary of Agriculture, consider corn's position last year and this. The A. A. A. 1934 program called for a reduction of only 200,000,000 bushels, but Providence intervened and reduced the crop by a billion bushels instead. The price, due to the drought, rose to 75 cents. This year, with restrictions still in effect and with fewer hogs to feed, the crop will be increased by 500,000,000 bushels to 2,100,000,000 bushels. And the price, despite the Secretary of Agriculture, will be 50 cents or less per bushel.

And while we are on the subject of crop shortages, let me complete the picture by summarizing what we have imported in agricultural products since the 1st of January of this year. These imports, for the 7 months up to the 1st of August, let me add, equal in terms of American farm lands now left idle and unused, crops which would normally be raised on no less than 13,000,000 acres. Here is a partial list, showing the increase in imports this year over last, both by volume and percentage:

	Jan. 1–Aug. 1—		Increase
	1935	1934	Times	Percent
Beef and veal	7,115,925 pounds	136,972 pounds	52	5,095
Ham, bacon, etc.	2,395,608 pounds	547,223 pounds	4.4	337
Canned meat	49,770,402 pounds	26,215,757 pounds	1.9	90
Butter	21,826,263 pounds	296,185 pounds	74	7,269
Lard	10,758,779 pounds	147,361 pounds	70	7,200
Barley	4,773,802 bushels
Corn	31,822,886 bushels	371,731 bushels	86	8,460
Oats	10,085,276 bushels	200,357 bushels	50	4,933
Wheat	9,801,745 bushels	557,602 bushels	17.6	1,658
Wheat flour	760,297 pounds	139,701 pounds	5.4	444

These facts would seem to demonstrate conclusively the essential fallacy underlying the New Deal's economic policy. Had we centered our attention first on the enlargement of domestic consumption rather than seeking to raise price levels and, second, upon regaining our position abroad, prices largely would have taken care of themselves. Instead, under the guise of an emergency, we resorted to the vicious practice of curtailment subsidy, when the whole lesson of history teaches the disastrous consequences which usually attend such experiments.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I understand that "prosperity" is here.

The highest authority assures the Nation, "We planned it that way; and don't let anybody tell you different."

Perhaps it is a fair question to ask, What kind of "prosperity"? Only when it can be said that at least a majority of our people have enough to eat—then and not until then—can the assertion be maintained that prosperity or "recovery", call it what we will, is really here. The measure of prosperity is not stock-market averages, or even the rate of employment. It is the well-being of the American people.

The truth is that during the past 3 years the standard of living of the American people has progressively declined to reach new lows. Under the Roosevelt administration purchasing power has dwindled until today, excluding those on relief, there are literally millions of our citizens on the border line of destitution. Even the bare necessities of life are beyond their reach. Public-health statistics show that undernourishment is becoming one of our major national problems.

The President himself admits that this condition exists. In an address at Atlanta, Ga., on November 29, he pointed out that the average of our citizenship today lives on a "third class diet."

In the items which I have just inserted in the RECORD I have shown the research that has brought forth the data, not only from the Brookings Institution, but from a document issued by the Department of Agriculture itself, which set forth the very items I have suggested. I refer to Department of Agriculture Circular No. 9296, published in November 1933.

The reason the President gives for this alarming condition to which I have referred is that "the masses of the American people have not got the purchasing power to eat more and better food." There in the President's own words we have the actual results that have followed the enforcement of the administration's doctrine of "scarcity."

Let us examine the President's words in the light of New Deal practice.

The Nation lives on a third-class diet simply because people have not enough money to buy the hogs, the cattle, the sheep, the corn, and the wheat that the farmer raises. So the growing of grain is restricted, food animals are destroyed. That is one side of the picture. Let us have a look at the other side.

While the cost of living has advanced 30 percent, the administration has conducted a reign of terror toward industry so that industry has failed to expand, employ more men, and raise wages and salaries as it normally would. Wages have only increased 3 percent compared to the 30-percent increase in the cost of living. The salaried worker receives the same number of dollars that he did at the beginning of this administration only his dollars, due to the devaluation, are worth less. As a result of all this, more people are forced on to a third-class diet; consequently, the farmer finds his market shrinking to the smaller and smaller proportions.

Who benefits? Certainly not the man on the third-class diet or the farmer. In this connection we might point out that the farmers have received only $1,000,000,000 in benefits, but, as they comprise 40 percent of our population, in the end, they must pay back into the Treasury their proportion of the $20,000,000,000 spent by the New Deal.

Secretary Wallace finds himself impaled upon the horns of a new dilemma—or should I say a "New Dealemma"?—even more serious than he faced 3 years ago. For him, as in the popular song, the problem keeps on going "round and round." The slaughter of food animals began in the fall of 1933. Now the Department of Agriculture estimates that for 1933 the per-capita consumption of all meats, excluding lard, was 142.9. The following year, meat from Government-slaughtered animals—such as was not destroyed—was given to people on relief so that the estimated consumption for 1934 rose to 152.6. Only last year did the true results of the policy of "scarcity" become apparent. Meat consumption went into a tail spin. The Department has not yet released its figures for 1935, but by applying the percentage change in production of Federal meats to the total consumption in 1934—which is the identical method the Department has used in the past—we find that total per-capita consumption dropped to 126.7 pounds. And remember, during 1935 this country imported no less than 346,000,000 pounds of meat in addition. Thus the farmer lost double, through reduced domestic consumption and through new foreign competitors admitted to his own markets.

Young Henry Wallace would not find himself in his present embarrassing and untenable position had be followed the precepts of the wiser and less-visionary member of his family—his own father, who, while Secretary of Agriculture, said:

The extent to which meat will constitute a part of the diet of this larger population will have an important bearing upon the farm practices of the corn grower.

This statement is found upon page 226 United States Department of Agriculture Yearbook for 1921.

The veteran Republican Secretary of Agriculture might well have had in mind a warning to the New Deal Secretary of Agriculture when, on page 223 of the 1921 yearbook, he wrote:

> The corn crop is subject so largely to the influence of the environment that nothing can be foretold as to the size of the coming crop. Drought and frost make large differences in yield from year to year. Disease and insect pests take their toll. With this in mind, it does not seem wise to reduce the acreage unduly on the basis of a surplus in 1 or 2 years.

We are now consuming less bread, the staff of life, than we did in 1932. The use of milk, so necessary for babies and growing children, has declined by 1,143,000,000 quarts. We eat 1,270,000,000 less pounds of green vegetables and fresh fruits than we did in 1932.

Last year, while the administration was proclaiming on every occasion, from the President's message on the "state of the Union" to the town meeting, that recovery had arrived, America actually decreased its meat consumption from the levels of only 2 years before by 3,290,000,000 pounds! Compare this with 1932, the last Republican year, admittedly the low point of the depression, not only in America but all over the world. In that year Americans consumed at the table 1,079,000,000 more pounds of meat than they did in 1935, with its alleged Roosevelt-induced "prosperity."

From these figures we may begin to understand the meaning of the President's statement that the average of our citizenship is living on a third-class diet. But, to get its true significance, let me tell you that "Machine Gun Kelly", confined in the Government prison out on Alcatraz Island, is today better fed than the same average American that the President talks about.

When we turn to a study of consumption of food products in American prisons, we find that the per-capita consumption of meats in these Federal institutions is more than twice that prescribed for the President's third-class diet. Likewise, more flours and cereals were consumed by Federal prisoners per capita in 1932 than are prescribed in any of the President's diets.

Thus, we arrive at the startling fact that every gangster, every counterfeiter, every dope peddler now incarcerated in a Federal penitentiary not only lives better but actually has twice as much to eat as the average of our free citizenship in this year of Roosevelt 1936. That is the situation revealed if we accept at face value the assertions Mr. Roosevelt made in his Atlanta speech; and remember that the President spoke only of the general average. Many a good American, too proud to accept Government help, is trying to last out the Roosevelt "prosperity" on a daily ration of potatoes; and the administration did its best to take the potatoes away from them!

How can such an appalling situation be reconciled with the Administration's relief program?

The Congress freely voted the billions of dollars which, the President asserted, would at once restore the country's purchasing power. Now, from the President himself, we learn that this objective has not been attained. Purchasing power has not been restored sufficiently to buy food to sustain life, even on a bare subsistence basis.

At this point I desire to insert in the RECORD a brief extract from this morning's New York Times. In an article by Mr. Charles R. Michael I find the following:

> The chief Roosevelt pronouncement attacked by the Republicans was his assertion that:
> "Reduction of costs of manufacture does not mean more purchasing power and more goods consumed. It means just the opposite."
> With regard to this Senator DICKINSON said:
> "The President is apparently still devoted to his theory that recovery is achieved by curtailing production and raising prices. The trouble with that theory is that it has been tried for 3 years and it has failed. It has definitely failed to increase purchasing power. As the result we still have more than 12,000,000 persons unemployed."

As a result of this philosophy, the farmers' market, instead of being enlarged has been still further narrowed. The problem of relief for the unemployed is more acute than ever. According to the American Federation of Labor, there are now 12,600,000 unemployed as against 11,600,000 when Mr. Roosevelt took office. Apparently the New Deal, through expenditures totaling some $20,000,000,000, has only succeeded in displacing an additional million workers.

Now, let us examine still other inevitable consequences which have followed the program of planned "scarcity." Destroying millions of hogs forced millions of people to go hungry; abandoning millions of acres of grain put prices for decent American food out of reach for millions of decent American families. As the logical, the inevitable consequence of this deliberate and wicked waste, for the first time, we have Americans living on food unfit for even dogs to eat. I mean that statement literally—food unfit for even dogs to eat.

Nearly everyone remembers the revelations contained in Upton Sinclair's book, The Jungle, published more than a generation ago. From that exposure came the "cleaning up" of the packing industry. Federal legislation followed which created sanitary safeguards surrounding the packing of meat and meat products that still is a model for the civilized world.

It will come, therefore, as a double shock to learn that in one of our great food industries jungle conditions still prevail, with all the implications and menace to the public health that horrified this country when Sinclair painted his graphic picture of conditions as they existed in 1906. I refer to the manufacture of canned dog food. These dog foods are freely displayed and sold to the public from groceries, drug stores, and all stores where food for humans is normally sold. The annual output of the industry amounts to approximately 500,000,000 cans, with a retail value of $40,000,000.

Now, the interesting things about the dog-food business is its present unprecedented prosperity. Its production has increased by leaps and bounds for no apparent reason. There has been neither a sudden rise in the birth rate in dogdom nor changes in dog appetites. The depression provides no explanation; on the contrary, dog owners were much more apt in hard times to feed table scraps than to purchase specially prepared foods. An investigation, begun by the manufacturers, and substantiated by reports from inspectors for the Department of Agriculture, leads to one indisputable conclusion. The increase in dog-food consumption can be accounted for because it was, and is today, being used for human beings.

Investigation reveals that a heavy demand exists among the poor people. None of these people are likely to buy prepared food for their dogs, yet quantities of such goods were found in many families even where there were no family pets. Indeed, this particular demand is now so great that Mr. L. J. Becker, former secretary of the National Dog Food Manufacturers' Association, estimates that today 20 percent of the entire output is eaten by human beings. That is a great deal of dog food—in fact, about 100,000,000 pounds annually. Now, the alarming fact in this situation is not that men and women have been actually compelled to eat food prepared for dogs, but that only 15 of the 200 plants manufacturing such food are under regular inspection by the Department of Agriculture. Next, and equally serious, is the character of this uninspected—one can hardly call it food—product. It comes from two sources: Carrion, made from dead animals, or else from the diseased lungs, livers, and fibrous tissues which make up the refuse from slaughterhouses. On the farm and around the stockyards it is known as tankage. Before this bonanza in dog foods began, it was used exclusively in the manufacture of fertilizer, and that is all it is actually fit for.

For the sake of fairness and the record, I desire to name the 15 packers whose product is inspected by the Department of Agriculture. They make pure, wholesome food products, and the public has a right to know who they are. These packers include Armour & Co., Chicago; Chappel Bros., Rockford, Ill.; Foell Packing Co., Chicago; George A. Hormel & Co., Austin, Minn.; Illinois Meat Co., Chicago; Loyal Packing Co., Chicago; Modern Food Process Co., Philadelphia; John Morrell & Co., Ottumwa, Iowa; Rath Packing Co., Waterloo, Iowa; Rich Products Corporation, Rockford, Ill.; Republic Food Products, Chicago; Rival Packing Co., Chicago; Schlesser Bros., Portland, Oreg; Swift & Co., Chicago; Wilson Packing Co., Chicago.

Passing for the moment the danger arising from the possibility of the spread of disease through the use of uninspected brands, and considering merely the nutrition value of such food, this fact has also been established: Through actual tests it has been shown that dogs fed exclusively on a diet of this stuff will die of malnutrition after a few months.

America had its embalmed-beef scandal in the days of the Spanish-American War; there was the "jungle" of 1906; but never before has there been a situation parallel to that now revealed—an administration which boasts of its humanitarian purpose, and yet permits shipment of offal in interstate commerce and permits its flagrant mislabeling as "fit for human consumption". Such is the exact wording which some of the labels carry.

That human consumption of dog food reached its peak at the very time the per-capita consumption of meat was at its low point may be merely a coincidence. It may have no relationship to the New Deal policy of scarcity or the ruthless and deliberate destruction of our fresh-meat animals. I do not know. But in no depression before this have we deliberately destroyed our meat animals or raised food prices out of reach of the masses of our people. How such a policy—which alters so radically the Nation's food habits—can benefit anyone in the long run is beyond my comprehension. It certainly can never make sense to the farmer, even with all of Secretary Wallace's or Mr. Tugwell's artful persuasion.

Another phenomenon which always follows in the wake of scarcity, whether "planned" or the more natural variety known as "famine", is the appearance in this country of certain diseases well known in China and other famine areas.

This product is so labeled that the public believes it—I now quote the exact wording of the label—is—

> Manufactured under light sanitary conditions, and contains meat byproducts, muscle meat, hulled cracked wheat, fresh carrots, red bran, garlic, fat, charcoal, soybean flour, cooked green bone, and bone marrow.

It almost makes your mouth water, does it not?

The conditions which I have recited here are described in great detail in 237 typewritten pages of hearings held on the code of fair competition for the canned dog-food industry. Those hearings, held in Washington under the very shadow of the Capitol, were attended by representatives of the Department of Agriculture. They heard this recital of facts, yet none of the material allegations were challenged, nor was any action ever taken with regard to the conditions revealed.

Mr. P. M. Chappel, of Chappel Bros., Inc., introduced exhibits of gross mislabeling. I shall quote from only one or two of the labels.

At the top of the list is one which reads: "Contains 85% U. S. inspected meat." A second puts forth the claim: "It contains U. S. inspected meat."

Now, every properly inspected food must bear the legend: "U. S. inspected and passed by the Department of Agriculture."

It seems obvious to me that these racketeers have labeled their product so as to mislead people to believe that it complied with the Government's specifications. Not only is this the fact, but the Government has permitted this fraud notwithstanding that there is ample law on the statute books which would have prevented it.

In all fairness to Dr. Mohler, I desire to say that I consider him to be one of the most efficient public officials in the Government service in Washington, D. C. The officials of the Department of Agriculture have had a serious time in deciding whether or not they had full authority to inspect all these plants. It is my understanding that the legal department of the Department of Agriculture has recently rendered an opinion holding that the law is not broad enough; so I take it that an additional bill on the subject should be introduced and enacted. I do find, however, that for a number of years there has been an inspection of the various types of food that have been put out before these labels could be put on the packages. Therefore, I wish to make no suggestion with reference to curtailment of the right of the Department of Agriculture to inspect these products. What I should like is to see the authority extended to a point where inspection is compulsory on all these products before they are permitted to be put on the shelves of dealers and sold under the conditions named.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LOGAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. DICKINSON. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if he has had opportunity to investigate, as a result of which he may now say where and by whom the food he describes as dog food is manufactured? Do the packers at the city of Chicago to whom the Senator has referred by name make this product and put it on the market?

Mr. DICKINSON. They make an inspected product, and there is no criticism of its sale, so far as I know, and the two plants in Iowa I have named make an inspected product. The theory I have is that such inspection ought to be extended to all products where there is any possibility of it being used for human consumption.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator happen to know and can he tell whence come these products which he feels have not been properly inspected and should not have been put on the market?

Mr. DICKINSON. I think that knowledge is in the hands of the Department of Agriculture. I think it is in the records here. I do not care to put it into the Senate RECORD.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, does the Senator intend to introduce a bill to correct the trouble of which he speaks?

Mr. DICKINSON. I think I shall. The matter came to my notice just a few days ago. I think it ought to be corrected. I have conferred with Dr. Mohler about it, and he wants it corrected. I do not believe we ought to let a condition continue under which 20,000,000 cans of dog food are being consumed by humans without some more protection than we are now giving.

Mr. McKELLAR. How long has this been going on?

Mr. DICKINSON. It was recited here February 5, 1935, in the code hearings, a transcript of which I have. Some of those who testified said the practice had been in effect sometime prior to that. I think the practice has increased with the depression, since the demand for cheaper foods has grown on the part of the public.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator any evidence that this dog food is used for human consumption?

Mr. DICKINSON. I merely have the evidence of the experts who testified at the code hearing.

Mr. McKELLAR. What did they testify?

Mr. DICKINSON. They testified that 20 percent of all the sales was used for human consumption, and the officials of the Department of Agriculture have said that there was knowledge on their part that there was such use.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I have not had the benefit of the early part of the Senator's remarks, but one reason behind the attempt to pass a pure food and drug bill through the Congress is the desire to do away with the possibility of many abuses such as that suggested. We passed a bill in the Senate looking to that end, and it is now before the committee of the House.

A great many things are going on in the sale of foods and drugs which ought not to be permitted. Of course, it is most distasteful to think that people are selling for human consumption food prepared for dogs, although I can conceive that many human beings are getting food these days which would not be good for dogs. If there is such a practice as that suggested by the Senator, it is because of the failure of the enactment of legislation to give protection to the American human family.

Mr. DICKINSON. It seems to me we could remedy this situation by simply expanding the authority of the Meat Inspection Act to cover not only human foods but making it broad enough to take in many things which might be used for human food. In other words, I think the definition must be broadened, in view of the interpretation of the Department attorneys that they do not have the right of inspection. They have been inspecting the products in the plants I have named. I think the law ought to be extended so that the inspection would cover every plant where there is a possibility that the products may reach human beings for consumption.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I did not hear the first part of the Senator's remarks, but I have tried to get the drift of his address. Do I understand that dog food is being put on the market and is being consumed by human beings?

Mr. DICKINSON. That is a fact, as I understand.

Mr. BONE. I was impelled to inquire of the Senator because I wondered whether the product was marked "dog food."

Mr. DICKINSON. It is; but it is marked "Inspected by the United States Department of Agriculture", when as a matter of fact much of it is not inspected. It is a fraud, and I think the Senator from New York is right; I think the matter should be covered by the food and drugs law.

Mr. BONE. The point of the Senator's remarks was that the product should be properly labeled?

Mr. DICKINSON. Properly labeled and properly inspected.

Mr. BONE. Of course, there would be no way legally to prevent people buying the food and consuming it themselves if they wanted to do it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, is the Senator from Iowa charging that the Department of Agriculture is permitting these labels to be put on dog food when it has not been inspected?

Mr. DICKINSON. Oh, not at all. There are some concerns which are putting on the United States inspection label when there has not been an inspection. That is a fraud.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator mean to say that the Department of Agriculture is responsible for that?

Mr. DICKINSON. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. Do they know about it?

Mr. DICKINSON. I think the trouble is the lack of proper law. I do not know that the Department of Agriculture can really inspect any dog food.

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely there is no law which permits dog food to be advertised as having been inspected when it has not been inspected.

Mr. DICKINSON. There is no law permitting that. The idea I wish to convey is that these labels are written so as to advertise the wholesomeness of the food, when as a matter of fact it is not inspected and it is not wholesome, as the testimony shows.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. It is a pathetic fact that today there are on the market many products which are improperly used by the human family. There is a famous mange cure, for example. I am not an authority on mange, but the particular remedy, which is supposed to be good for mange in beasts, is being sold to people as a cure for tuberculosis, a perfectly outrageous and fraudulent affair.

Further, the Department of Agriculture has discovered that 20 percent of the drugs on the shelves of the drug stores of the United States are below standard. A physician exercising his skill and training, may write a prescription and send it to the drug store, and the druggist, who is a trained man but who has to depend upon the manufacturer for his stock of drugs, will fill the prescription with a product which is inferior, which is not at all what was prescribed.

The question is, How can such things happen? They are all along the same line as that suggested by the Senator from Iowa. The truth is that a niggardly Congress, failing to appropriate sufficient money to provide inspectors to go out and uncover these conditions in the markets, is responsible for these evils.

There was the "ginger jake" epidemic. Thousands of people in the Southwest were permanently paralyzed by reason of this product getting into commerce.

There must be better inspection. In the last agricultural appropriation bill as it passed the Senate the amount of money for inspection was increased by $250,000. The Budget Bureau had recommended $500,000, but the House cut the amount to $250,000, and the Senate added $250,000 in order that there may be officials of the Government to go out and discover such transgressions of the law as those mentioned by the Senator from Iowa and make corrections.

It is not the fault of any one official; it is the fault of the United States Congress in failing to appropriate money. It is not any political party's fault, because it is a fault which has existed through all administrations since I have known anything about foods and drugs.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, in order to present a graphic recital of the conditions, I shall quote from a letter written by Dr. D. M. Campbell, editor of Veterinary Medicine. He said:

> I am intimately acquainted with the canned dog-food industry and have known it for years. At present it is in a deplorable condition due to unconscionable practices of racketeers who infest it in large numbers. Its products are to a large extent filthy, unwholesome, innutritious, unfit for a dog to eat or for its owner to take into his home. Sales are made through fraud and deception in labeling and advertising. I, and most other veterinarians, maintain that unwholesome canned dog food is responsible for a vast amount of illness and mortality among dogs and cheats dog owners out of millions of dollars annually. The protection of honest dog-food manufacturers no less than of the public demands official regulation of this industry. Such regulation has already been delayed much too long. The industry, as a result of abuses, is in a chaotic state. It is unprofitable to those engaged in it and a calamity to the dog-owning public. Proper regulation will benefit every worthy manufacturer, give the public something of value for its money and eliminate incalculable cruelty to man's best friend, the dog.

This is suggestive of a favorite story they tell around the stockyards. A manufacturer, so the story goes, claimed that he was packing a 50–50 product of horse meat and rabbit. When asked what he meant by "50-50", he explained that he ground up one horse and one rabbit. That is a pretty good ratio of inspected meat in some of this dog food.

Now let us see what the record reveals in respect to the human consumption and the ingredients of dog food.

At the hearing on the canned dog-food industry before the National Industrial Recovery Administration, held February 5, 1935, Mr. Charles Wesley Dunn, executive secretary of the code authority of the dog industries (p. 53), said:

> When I first came to this position as investigating the dog-food business, one of the first things I learned was that this phrase "Fit for human consumption" was actually working out to induce, according to the reports I received, the consumption of dog food in different parts of the country by human beings, and I was informed that some of the dog food which was being so consumed was not fit for human consumption.

Mr. C. J. Rich, Rich Products Corporation, Rockford, Ill., on page 82, said:

> I believe the Government Department of Agriculture has evidence that a great deal of canned dog food is being used for human consumption. From our own experience we are sure that canned dog food is being used for human consumption.

Mr. P. M. Chappel, Chappel Bros., Inc., Rockford, Ill., on page 164, said:

> I think that the Department of Agriculture has some figures on this. I do not know if those gentlemen have been familiar with this or not, but there have been some tests made of districts, and I was notified that in one alley there were 68 cans and there was not a dog in the block.
> I wanted to check up on some of them and I made some tests of our own in Chicago, and I was quite astonished at the number of people that were eating dog food.

Mr. Rich, on page 85 of the record, said:

> Another example: Throughout the eastern part of the country people, and especially the housewife, do not generally know what "tankage" is. For instance, when calling on a certain jobber in the New York territory, I saw a competitive dog-food salesman eating the uninspected products he was selling; and he claimed—I heard him say it—that it was good enough to eat because the meat content was a high-grade "tankage." That is not a second-hand tale. I was there when he did that, when he was eating it. I told the fellow after the man had left—he didn't know who I was—"You had better tell that fellow what tankage is." And he said, "What is it?" I said, "It is sewage; it is packing-house garbage. If it is good sewage or poor sewage, that is what that fellow was eating."

As to Government neglect in this emergency, let the executive code officer, Mr. Dunn, speak to you from the record. Mr. Dunn said:

> As the situation now stands, dog food is subject to compcsition and label control under both the Food and Drugs Act and this code; and some of such food is also subject to similar control under the Federal Meat Inspection Act. Moreover, its label is further subject to control under the Trade Commission Act.
> The fact of the case is that the Food and Drugs Act has complete jurisdiction over dog food in interstate commerce, and the only reason that the administration is not paying attention to dog food, or has not in the past, is that they have something more important to do in dealing with human food.

"Something more important to do"! What could be more important than safeguarding the Nation's health? In that lame apology we have the full measure of the shortcomings of Mr. Roosevelt and his butterfly-chasing mentors. While they aimlessly flutter hither and yon seeking a new civilization that can exist only in their own visionary minds, they completely overlook the very real remedies provided by an older and wiser civilization. That is the reason this Nation has lagged behind other nations in recovery.

The administration cannot deny responsibility. As shown by the record, for more than a year—since February 1935—they have known that this shocking condition has existed. If, for any reason, they did not agree with Mr. Dunn as to their authority to act under existing statutes, they need only to have asked this Congress for additional legislation, and it would have been granted. But they did nothing. They continued to permit the uninformed victims of their planned scarcity to eat food that was literally unfit even for dogs.

Gentlemen of the New Deal, while you are indulging your dream of Utopia, please, out of the billions of our money you are so recklessly spending, spare us the paltry few pennies needed to enforce the pure-food laws so we may know that third-class food is clean food.

EXTENSION OF VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, with the consent of the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], ranking member of the Committee on Immigration, in charge of the pending measure now before the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business, being Senate bill 2969, be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2883, the vocational education bill, which is Calendar No. 1590.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have no objection to that course. I assume that under that request the unfinished business will again come before the Senate and be taken up as soon as the vocational education bill is out of the way.

Mr. McNARY. I did not distinctly hear the request of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I requested that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2883, the vocational education bill, being Calendar No. 1590.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection, provided the bill does not in any way interfere with the special order for 2 o'clock today.

Mr. GEORGE. It will not do so. Of course I shall ask that the bill be laid aside temporarily, if necessary, to take up the special order.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator will make that request, and upon completion of the special order for 2 o'clock the unfinished business will come back before the Senate?

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2883.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2883) to provide for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not in disagreement with that request. However, the bill is an important one, modeled after the one bearing the Senator's name in part. I think a statement by the Senator of the purposes of the bill would be rather helpful at this time.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I shall be pleased to make an explanation of the bill. I do not believe I can do so before the hour of 2 o'clock, when the special order is to come up.

Mr. McNARY. Then, if the Senator will yield to me, I shall suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

REGISTRATION OF LOBBYISTS

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from the American Farm Bureau Federation. It is only a little over a page in length, and I therefore ask that the clerk may be permitted to read it from the desk.

There being no objection, the letter was read by the Chief Clerk, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 1, 1936.

Senator HUGO L. BLACK,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BLACK: The so-called lobby-registration bill has now passed the House in a form which is too greatly modified and is back before the Senate, and will, one may assume, be considered by the proper committee. Since this question has been before Congress in one form or another for 10 years, it would not appear to be necessary to have more hearings on the measure; however, if hearings are to be held, the American Farm Bureau Federation will desire to be heard in favor of a more inclusive bill than the House measure.

Any organization which is not ashamed of its program, its resources, its personnel, and its methods of activity should not ask to be excluded from registration before proper House and Senate officials. Whether the financial resources of an organization are great or small, and whether these resources come from a few individuals in large amounts or from a multitude of individuals in small amounts, the facts relative to financial resources should be made known, not only for Members of Congress but for the public at large.

In fact, there should be no exemption on the part of any organization which works at Washington, whether or not it maintains regular offices here, in regard to registration. There should be no loophole in the language of the measure, so that certain organizations might not be compelled to register if their activities were not principally those which are usually characterized as lobbying. Furthermore, lobbying, whether or not defined specifically in the measure, should be the general context of the bill, but understood to include not only legislative work on Capitol Hill in seeking to promote or defeat bills pending, but should include also activities among the departments of Government and independent offices thereof.

The legislative above described has been supported by the American Farm Bureau Federation for several years. The type of registration sought to be required will not stop lobbying. Its definite tendency, however, will be to place lobbying on a higher plane by bringing lobbying and those who usually classify as lobbyists out in the open. All this will be good, not only for great citizenship organizations, one of which the American Farm Bureau Federation happens to be, but will also be beneficial in securing legislation which has been more thoughtfully considered by all concerned. This type of registration proposed for lobbying groups and for lobbyists employed thereby, whether or not such lobbyists are definitely stationed in Washington or come here upon call or voluntarily, will also serve the very useful purpose of protecting Members of Congress and other Government officials from pressure, the hidden sources of which sometimes prove deeply frightful.

It will be along the above outline of objectives that the American Farm Bureau Federation will testify if any further public hearings are desired to be held on this proposition.

Very respectfully,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
CHESTER H. GRAY,
Washington Representative.

BENEFIT PAYMENTS UNDER AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, in pursuance of the unanimous-consent agreement the Chair lays before the Senate Senate Resolution 265, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 265) submitted by Mr. VANDENBERG on March 23, 1936, and reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments, on page 1, line 2, after the word "Senate", to strike out "forthwith the name and address and the amount paid to each producer, receiving $10,000 in each calendar year" and insert "as soon as practicable the name, county, and State (including Puerto Rico and Hawaii), and the amount paid to each producer, in the sum of $10,000 or more, for each contract year, together with commodity, acreage, or number of livestock involved for which payment was made"; and in line 10, after the word "amended", to insert the following proviso: "Provided, That the total amount paid for each basic commodity, for each State or Territory or possession, be given for each contract year and the total number receiving such payments", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate as soon as practicable the name, county, and State (including Puerto Rico and Hawaii), and the amount paid to each producer, in the sum of $10,000 or more, for each contract year, together with commodity, acreage, or number of livestock involved for which payment was made, pursuant to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended: Provided, That the total amount paid for each basic commodity for each State or Territory or possession be given for each contract year and the total number receiving such payments.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I propose to offer to the pending resolution and ask that it be read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the resolution it is proposed to add the following:

Provided, That the United States Tariff Commission shall, and is hereby directed to, report to the Senate within 60 days the names and addresses of manufacturing corporations in the United States having statutory net incomes in 1934 of $1,000,000 or more producing commodities protected by the tariff, the rates of duty on principal commodities produced by each, and the 1934 selling prices derived from general sources of such commodities: And provided further, That the Commission shall and is hereby directed to supplement this report as soon as the information can be compiled, but with the time for compilation not limited to 60 days, similar information as to corporations, commodities, rates, and prices for the year 1935, together with the Commission's estimates of the following: (1) The effect of the tariff on selling prices of such commodities; (2) the effect of the tariff on the statutory net incomes of these corporations; (3) the effect of such rates of duty on consumer expenditures for such commodities as compared with revenue derived by the United States Treasury therefrom.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the resolution now before the Senate has been pending for several days. The able Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] has been anxious to have it considered. It has not been taken up earlier for the reason that information reached me that several Senators desired to discuss the resolution. What I shall have to say in connection with the subject matter now before the Senate will be brief.

Everyone familiar with the history and the terms of the resolution recognizes that the promptings behind it are partisan political considerations. Evidently some have thought—not only some in the Senate, but others who have written upon the subject—that some great political advantage was to be derived by the opponents of the administration now in power by publishing the names of the beneficiaries of the large payments made under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Let it be understood in the beginning, Mr. President, that the Agricultural Adjustment Act was primarily for the purpose of regulating or controlling the production of staple or basic commodities of which there were alleged to exist large surpluses at the time of the passage of the act; and everyone must have known also that in order to make the regulation effective, it would be necessary to extend the operation of the act to large producers as well as to small producers.

Under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, more than six and a half million payments of benefits to landowners and tenants have been made, and of this number most of them have been relatively small payments. The plan of the act could not have been effective if the greatest producers had been excluded from its operations and the benefits paid only to small producers. So there is nothing surprising, nothing amazing, to any intelligent person, even though he be a Senator [laughter], that large payments were made in the course of the administration of the act.

The Senator from Michigan may boast a measure of consistency which other Senators on the other side of the Chamber are not in a position to claim. For instance, the great keynoter for the next Republican convention, if one is to be held this year [laughter], voted for the Agricultural Adjustment Act, but the Senator from Michigan voted against it. I find, however, upon examination of the record, that the Senator from Michigan was more inconsistent than were the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and myself when we voted for the Agricultural Adjustment Act, because, while the Senator from Michigan voted against the measure that permitted millions of small payments to be made and at the same time authorized a comparatively small number of large payments, he voted for the one act connected with this program that he must have known contemplated only large payments. When the Senator from Michigan voted for the Jones-Costigan Act, the sugar-control act, he supported a measure that he well understood at the time contemplated benefit payments to the large sugar growers. Since most of the sugar growers, when compared with the producers of cotton, wheat, tobacco, rice, and other so-called basic commodities, cultivate large areas they therefore would be entitled to receive large benefits. Nearly all the really big payments were made to the sugar growers, and the Senator from Michigan voted for that act, notwithstanding the fact that he must have known that the successful administration of the law would require large payments to be made. For instance, in Hawaii the sugar production is limited to large corporations. If attempt had been made to exclude them from the operations of the law there could have been only ineffectual regulation of production.

The Senator has become a great champion of publicity. He and I have usually taken similar views on that subject. We have not sought to arouse antagonism by giving publicity to records which might very well have been withheld. In 1932 the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] submitted a resolution in the Senate requiring the publication of the names of all borrowers from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Under the operations of the law those charged with its administration found it necessary to make very large loans, enormous loans, to a considerable number of corporations. Loans ranging in the neighborhood of $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 were made to banks, railroads, and other corporations.

When it was sought to publish the names of the borrowers the Senator from Michigan made a very eloquent appeal to the Senate not to adopt the Norris resolution, which had that end in view. Those Senators who hear him now as the emboldened champion of publicity for political purposes will be amazed to recall what he said when no Presidential campaign was in prospect for him and when only a senatorial campaign in Michigan was in the offing. I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where the Senator from Michigan said:

> On the other hand, Mr. President, I am bound to say that I profoundly disagree with the analysis of the Senator from Nebraska respecting the advisability of pursuing the thing still further and pursuing it, as I see it, unnecessarily, after we have established this point of contact between the Senate and the Corporation. I disagree that wholesale publicity for these fiduciary relationships would be useful. On the contrary, I feel that elementary prudence requires that their confidential character be respected. We can make all necessary inquiry in behalf of the public welfare through the agency of this proposed committee. I favor it. But we defeat this same public welfare if we make these fiduciary relationships a matter of common advertising and gossip, and thus too often a matter of illegitimate popular speculation and of unwarranted hysterical suspicion. We would tear down the very edifice which we have sought to erect.

That was part of the speech which the able Senator from Michigan made in this body on the 11th of July 1932. He thought it would be distinctly harmful to publish the names of the borrowers from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the amounts which they had secured in the way of loans from that organization. He characterized it as "tending to promote gossip and speculation." He expressed a very "virtuous" indignation against the policy of giving publicity at that time. He referred to the fact that fiduciary relationships existed between the Government and the borrowers. There was under discussion a very large loan which it was well known had been made to a single bank. There was under discussion at different times during the debate other large loans which had been made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The Senator from Michigan took the position then, and I agreed with him, that it was neither necessary nor advantageous to give the publicity which was sought in the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska.

At another time there was what was known in the Senate as the "pink slip" amendment. I believe the original amendment was offered by the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to correct him in that regard?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The amendment which I offered and which was adopted by the Senate provided for making income-tax returns public records. The so-called "pink slip" provision was reported by the conference committee as a compromise between the position which the Senate took and the position taken by the conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. I was about to say, when the Senator anticipated me, that the Senator from Wisconsin introduced in this body an amendment authorizing publicity with respect to income-tax returns. Again I agreed with the Senator from Michigan. We supported that modification of the provision which came to be known as the "pink slip" amendment. The Senator from Michigan was again eloquent in opposing publicity. He thought it would be harmful, not advantageous, but there was no Presidential campaign in prospect for him then. There was just an ordinary congressional campaign in the offing. The Senator spoke very eloquently against the amendment providing for publicity of income-tax returns. He opposed the Agricultural Adjustment Act which for the most part provided for small payments to the beneficiaries, but he supported the Jones-Costigan Act, which contemplated enormous payments to its beneficiaries.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator remarked a moment ago that at the time of the controversy over the publication of loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, there was a Presidential election in the offing. In July 1932, of course, there was a Presidential election in the offing, but I suppose the Senator from Arkansas meant that the Senator from Michigan was not in the offing at that time. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. That is what was meant, and I thank the Senator for the correction.

Mr. President, I do not criticize the Senator from Michigan for changing his attitude on these subjects. He has a perfect right to do so; but it would be interesting to know the processes by which he has come to occupy an entirely different position from that which he assumed or occupied in 1932.

The statement which I read, in which the Senator opposed publicity with reference to loans of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, epitomized very ably the argument of those who did not think any public advantage was to be gained by advertising the names of persons who had secured financial assistance through a Government agency.

I ask, now, what is the advantage, other than a political advantage, that the Senator can seek by advertising the names of the beneficiaries of these payments under the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act?

To illustrate what some outside of the Senate think of it, I refer to a recent speech made by that great radio speaker to whom all delight to listen, Mr. Boake Carter. A few nights ago I had the pleasure of hearing him when he took for his principal subject the resolution of the able Senator from Michigan, which is now under consideration by the Senate, and he said:

> Well, Senator VANDENBERG is still fishing for answers to his query: How many people have received $10,000 a year or more from Triple A in benefit checks? So he prodded Secretary of Agriculture Wallace anew this afternoon in Washington by saying that first the Secretary had said $29,000 was the highest check paid out, but later had corrected himself and admitted that $78,000 topped the list. But, insofar as total payments go, it is said now that a Hawaiian sugar company pulled down nearly a million—

And so forth.

Reference is then made to the payment to a cotton company in the State of Arkansas.

Continuing the quotation from Mr. Carter:

> All of which is causing much puffing and snorts of indignation among Republican high commanders.
> Senator VANDENBERG is included. Well, if the snorts of indignation are because of an outraged sense of righteousness, then perhaps the snorters are indulging in a little public hypocrisy. They are snorting at nothing less than a tariff, and a tariff is a pet G. O. P. baby. The Triple A has been building up a domestic tariff for the farm group and the cotton group and the sugar group and all the rest of them, and surely it's been swatting the consumers and paying out to the farmer group to be sure.
> The total benefits paid by the Triple A are said to be in the neighborhood of a billion dollars to date, and that covers the 2-year life of the Triple A. And take the manufacturers' tariff which has been in effect for a little over a century, and which reached a climax in the Smoot-Hawley business; and the millions paid out by consumers into the pockets of manufacturers, when totaled up, would make the Triple A benefits to agriculture look like a pink-tea party in comparison.
> And if a sugar grower walked off with more than a million of Triple A checks, then go back to the Smoot-Hawley Act, which boosted the sugar rates up 2 cents a pound in 1930. This made sugar more expensive to the American housewife to the tune of more than a hundred million dollars a year. The Government got half of that, and the producers got the other half. Nineteen hundred and thirty—sixty million a year—5 years—three hundred millions. Surely it looks as if Senator VANDENBERG is indulging in a little of what that good old political stuff of his once called the pot calling the kettle black. * * * It doesn't necessarily follow at all that when the Triple A pays out pretty handsome benefit checks, it's doing right; but the point is that when the G. O. P. high command shoots holes through the administration's A. A. A. for paying out such checks, then the high command is forgetting that it started the whole protective tariff principle years and years ago.
> The farmer eventually shouted that if his manufacturing brother was going to get a subsidy through tariff protection, then he, too—the farmer—ought to get something like that. The A. A. A. catered to the farmers, and there are big farmers as well as little ones; and to big farmers somewhat naturally, it would seem, would go the big checks, because the acreage they cover is bigger in proportion than his little neighbor.

So long as the manufacturer is protected by his tariff, so long will the farmer demand that he get some sort of like protection to equalize his income. In a word, then, all the farmers have been doing is wearing the tariff hat, and the G. O. P. does not like it. Unfortunately though, for the G. O. P., it is vulnerable on this point—although you tread on one of its tenderest corns when you tell them that it is. The Senator from Michigan would sound perhaps a wee bit more convincing if each time he cracked down on the tariff-promoting A. A. A. he also issued a comparative set of figures showing how much similar benefits the G. O. P. has paid out in tariff during the last 100 years. Then he would not be open to the come-back that most of his pecking at the A. A. A. was political.

That is the statement of an eminent citizen of this country, a publicity man who speaks to us frequently over the radio. He has not any particular appreciation for the A. A. A., but he has severe criticism for those who vote against the A. A. A. on the ground that it will give the farmers some of the benefits of a tariff, and who at the same time vote for a high protective tariff.

Mr. President, I respectfully submit that this "political issue" will not avail the opponents of this administration. When the Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed, there was a condition relating to agriculture in this country that is difficult to describe. The returns which farmers then received for their products were disproportionately small compared with the prices paid for manufactured products. Since the close of the World War, every administration that has come into power has sought to devise some practical way to put the farmer on a plane of equality with the manufacturer. Every effort that has been made failed until the Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed. You may say what you please about it, you may criticize it if you will, but it did accomplish its primary purpose. It did raise and maintain at a fair standard the prices of staple agricultural products. It did give to the farmers of the Nation, who were then impoverished beyond my power to describe, some measure of benefits which tended to put them on a plane of equality with others to whom they had been contributing in the form of excessive tariffs paid throughout a hundred years.

I also suggest that one who voted for the sugar program, under which only large payments can be made, cannot very effectively criticize another who voted for the act under which millions of small payments have been made, as well as a few large payments.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has indicated his purpose to offer an amendment which, while you are embarrassing the farmers of the country and seeking to embarrass the administration by making public that which the Senator from Michigan in 1932 said ought not to be made public, will also give publicity to the benefits paid to those who are engaged in other spheres of industry.

Mr. VANDENBERG obtained the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment? I desire to offer an amendment to his resolution. I do not wish to discuss the amendment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There are several amendments pending. However, I am very happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator has such an attractive resolution that we all wish to be associated with it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; and if it is to be an omnibus resolution, I assure the Senator that there are numerous additional amendments to be offered on this side of the aisle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). The amendment offered by the Senator from Texas will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, after line 13, it is proposed to insert:

Resolved further, That the United States Tariff Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate forthwith the names and addresses and the gross volume of sales of the three corporations or factories (naming them separately for each article or group listed below) which did the largest gross business during the calendar year 1934 in the production and manufacturing of the following tariff-protective articles and commodities: (1) Aluminum; (2) steel and iron; (3) photo cameras and films; (4) chemicals and dyes; (5) electric appliances and equipment; (6) cellophane and rayon; (7) plate glass; (8) cast-iron pipe and fittings; (9) articles or wares manufactured of tin.

Such Commission is also requested to furnish the tariff rates or schedules then in effect as to each of such listed commodities or articles.

Such Commission is also requested to furnish the total amount in dollars of benefits or protection each of such corporations received during such year, assuming that the tariff was fully effective. Such Commission is also requested (if it would not delay the filing of such report) to give its estimate as to the percentage of effectiveness of such tariff rates for such year as to each of such articles or commodities.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I should like to tender an amendment to the pending resolution, and I ask that it be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That on the basis of the data submitted, the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry shall report to the Senate the degree to which land ownership had by 1933 become concentrated in large corporate holdings, with such recommendations as the committee may see fit to make to Congress.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I greatly enjoyed the performance of the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], as I am sure he did. But it is a very curious circumstance to me, as it has been for the last 6 weeks, that every time I have undertaken to ask for simple information regarding the Triple A benefit payment checks someone has wanted to change the subject. The administration's spokesmen immediately want to talk about something else.

In the first instance, the Secretary of Agriculture spent a week providing himself with one excuse after another as to why this information should not be made public. His consternation was little short of pathetic. Finally he came to the conclusion, apparently, in an eleventh-hour repentance, that it would be better if the information were made public; and I commend him for the position which he now occupies in that respect, inasmuch as he now joins me in asking that the resolution shall be agreed to. After better than a month of shadow-boxing, the administration spokesman in the Senate also has finally come to a similar healthy conclusion. But apparently we must first have an afternoon of diverting debate.

Mr. President, the able Senator from Arkansas indicates that there is nothing but a political purpose motivating this inquiry. He constantly refers to the inquiry as being "criticism." Yet, if he will search the RECORD, he will discover that I have been exceedingly careful not to prejudge the case in any aspect. I have merely asked for information regarding the public business. I have merely asked for information regarding the payment of $1,000,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States on the ipse dixit of one nonelected public official, who spent it where he pleased, when he pleased, how he pleased, and as he pleased. I have merely asked for information, and apparently the mere quest for information has been interpreted as criticism. Evidently the information is expected to carry dynamite, I can only conclude that these eminent gentlemen anticipate what will be the result if the information is furnished. They would apparently fear that the information will itself stir the criticism which they hasten in advance to condemn.

My able friend from Arkansas says that my motive in respect to the inquiry is political. I doubt if any of us could search our hearts this year and find them free from some degree of political interest, and I include the very able Senator from Arkansas, who will preside with great efficiency over the coming Democratic National Convention, ably preceded by the author of one of the amendments to the resolution, who will preside as temporary chairman over the same convention. I suspect they probably have about the same element and measure of politics—if not more—in their contemplations as they charge to me. Politics is not a closed book to my friends across the aisle, as I presume they will continue to demonstrate during the remainder of the afternoon.

But I should like to submit, Mr. President, that there is a phase of this matter which does transcend partisan politics. I wish to submit that the meager information which the Senate has obtained and which the country has obtained as a result of the utterly inadequate disclosures thus far made since my resolution was submitted in the Senate proves the importance, as a matter of sound public policy, and without relationship either to Republicanism or Democracy, of having this information available for serious congressional study. The truth is dangerous only to those who shun it.

Let me tell the Senate precisely what I mean. If and when we resume benefit payments to agriculture in any form whatsoever, should we not sharply concentrate the benefits upon the average, small, individual farmer, speaking loosely, upon the family farm, and progressively decrease the rate of benefits for the large farm and the corporation farm? Is not the application of the principle of graduated-income taxation in reverse necessarily applicable if we are to confine the general principle of farm relief within legitimate and rational boundaries? Is it not a fact that the cumulative effect of prorating benefits paid to the big corporation farmer gives the latter a far greater relative benefit than is enjoyed by the smaller, individual, family farmer? Surely it is not politics to probe this calculation.

Indeed, if it be politics to get these facts about million-dollar subsidies, I can only say to the Secretary, and I can only say to my able friend from Arkansas, make the most of it. I think it is essential, I think it is utterly important to any rational development and expansion of a sound farm program that precisely the information which we already have bearing upon this subject of corporation farming should be definitely and specifically available, and I emphatically welcome the amendment which has been offered by my able friend the Senator from Washington, and I hope it will be added to the resolution, because it bears specifically upon this farm-ownership problem.

The whole country, and every farmer in it wants to know about a subsidy system which pays, for example, $219,825 in 2 years—and pays it in secret—to one corporation for not raising hogs on 445 California acres. They want to know about $168,000 paid in joint benefits to one cotton corporation for abandoning 7,000 acres. They want to know about wheat checks totaling $78,638 to one beneficiary in 2 years. They want to know about enormous sugar checks. It is utterly pertinent to an adequate study of this whole problem for the future. The country wants all this related information, and it would be absurd to deny it.

Mr. President, there are a few other things which we have already learned as a result of the disclosure that has been made in a preliminary fashion since the resolution was offered, and I again submit that they do not fall under the indictment of a mere political purpose. Without questioning the honesty of anyone, a thing which I flatly renounce, are we not put upon inquiry, as a result of the meager information already available, whether it is sound public policy to leave any share of the responsibility for the granting of the payment of these subsidies in the hands of Government officers who are themselves large beneficiaries of these subsidies being granted and paid? Can there be any two opinions upon this proposition? Does it not involve a conflict of interest which the prudent administration of public affairs cannot tolerate? If it be politics to ask this question, is it not essential politics in the most useful sense of that word?

I do not believe any attempt will be made to defend the mingling of functions which we already see occurring in respect to the receipt of large benefit payments with the left hand from a right hand dealing them out in an official capacity in relationship to the responsibility of administering the benefit-payment law.

Mr. President, at this point I ask to have inserted in the RECORD Mr. Stanley Chipman's discussion of this particular phase of the problem, which appeared in the Providence Journal on April 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITISH-OWNED FIRM IN MISSISSIPPI GETS HUGE A. A. A. PAYMENTS—CONCERN HEADED BY ASSOCIATE OF WALLACE—OPERATES LARGE COTTON PLANTATION—SENATE COMMITTEE TO URGE PUBLICITY FOR THOSE RECEIVING BENEFITS

By Stanley Chipman

WASHINGTON, April 4.—A $5,000,000 cotton-growing enterprise in Mississippi, British-controlled according to Dun & Bradstreet, and headed by a $42,000-a-year president, who is also one of the ranking officials in A. A. A., has been an outstanding beneficiary of Federal subsidies in the form of rental and benefit payments, the Providence Journal learned today.

The Senate Committee on Agriculture agreed this afternoon to report, with recommendation for passage, a resolution ordering Secretary of Agriculture Wallace to identify for the Senate all farmers who received more than $1,000 in such payments. The measure's sponsor, VANDENBERG, of Michigan, had asked for a report on all payments in excess of $10,000. On the floor he has asserted that some participants in the crop-control program have received more than $200,000.

The British-controlled firm is the Delta & Pine Land Co., of Scott, Miss. It owns 50,000 acres and operates one of the largest cotton plantations in the country, if not the largest.

According to Dun & Bradstreet, it is controlled by the Fine Spinners and Doublers Association of Manchester, England. Fixed assets of the Mississippi enterprise are set at $5,290,000 and current liabilities at $2,600. Current assets amount to $276,000; outstanding bonds total $5,000,000.

Its president is Oscar G. Johnston, prominently associated with Secretary Wallace and Administrator Davis in the A. A. A.

The Delta Pine & Land Co. has participated extensively in the A. A. A. program. The Department of Agriculture has refused to disclose how much money was given the company in subsidies, but it is known to be a huge amount. Reliable information is that the company is the fourth largest beneficiary of A. A. A. funds.

Its acreage is in the Delta area of the Mississippi, where the rich soil produces long-staple cotton, used in the finest of cotton textiles. A. A. A. records show that the average per acre benefit for the country was $8.60, but that in the Mississippi Delta the average was $10.60. Past productivity of the land was a major factor in A. A. A.'s determination of payments. In some cases, notably in the Mississippi Delta, the per-acre payments were much higher than $10.60.

Secretary Wallace has refused firmly to disclose the total amounts paid out to big participants in his crop-control program. At least two Senators have formally asked for this information specifically with regard to the Delta Pine & Land Co., but without success.

Mr. Johnston, who is regarded as one of the most able cotton growers in the South, manages the cotton producers' pool from A. A. A. headquarters, where he is paid on a per-diem basis. He is also a director and first vice president of the Commodity Credit Corporation, created by an Executive order of President Roosevelt to deal in agricultural commodities and to lend or borrow money upon them. It is essentially a lending institution and may make loans directly to producers or through banks.

Vested with official powers which enable him to exercise vast influence over cotton growing and merchandising of raw cotton, Johnston's remuneration from the Government is understood to be far less than he receives as president of the British-controlled company.

Treasury tax records, which were sent to the present Congress in compliance with recently enacted law, show that for the 1934 period the company paid him a salary of $27,000 and a bonus af $15,055.29, giving him a total of $42,055.29.

The Delta & Pine Land Co. as such does not retain all moneys distributed by A. A. A. in subsidies for cotton acreage voluntarily taken out of production on its property; its sharecroppers or tenant farmers have received a percentage. According to A. A. A. officials here, the tenant growers' last share amounted to about 18 percent.

Mr. Johnston's integrity as a Government official never has been questioned. Attention has been attracted to his dual capacities, however, in view of charges on the Senate floor that big interests have been the principal gainers from A. A. A. funds.

The question also may be raised whether the financial interests held in the Delta & Pine Land Co. by the English textile firm has not aided it to compete with American textile manufacturers. Inasmuch as the English company is reported to be the principal bondholder in the Mississippi enterprise, it is assumed that it enjoyed interest payments through revenue derived in substantial measure from United States Government subsidies. It is recognized in that connection that such subsidies were largely financed by processing taxes levied on American processors. Domestic cotton textile manufacturers had to pay many millions of dollars in processing taxes before the latter were found to be invalid by the Supreme Court.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, there is another question which already is laid at the bar of the Senate. If it wants seriously to discuss the question of farm benefits on a basis of equitable distribution, there is another question which already rises as a result of the preliminary information which we thus have.

If one branch of the Government leases public or quasi-public lands to a big farm operator, is it wise for another branch of the same government to pay the same operator large subsidies for not cultivating the lands thus leased? By any stretch of the imagination can this be defined as "planned economy"? Is it not instead a species of planless extravagance with other people's money? Are we not put upon notice that we need a new and larger measure of coordination? Surely it is not a political motive which inquires into the importance of this coordination.

Mr. President, rather than burden the Senate's time with a detailed discussion of this phase of the matter, I ask that a discussion of this question of large wheat payments to the operators of Government-leased lands, as it appeared in the New York Times on April 8, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of Apr. 8, 1936]

RENTED LAND GAVE CAMPBELL $50,000 IN A. A. A. PAYMENTS—"WHEAT KING" SHOWN RECEIVING BENEFITS FROM INDIAN TRACTS OBTAINED AT "BARGAIN PRICES"—WALLACE SEES "POLITICS"—HE THUS DESCRIBES DEMANDS FOR DATA ON GRANTS—VAN DEVANTER RETURNED CHECKS

By Felix Belair, Jr.

WASHINGTON, April 8.—From information obtained from several Federal bureaus, it was disclosed today that Thomas Campbell, Montana "wheat king", received more than $50,000 from the A. A. A. for not planting a full crop on land rented from the Indians at "bargain prices."

For not planting wheat, the large-scale operator received about $7 an acre on land which Indian Bureau officials said could be rented for 50 cents to $1.50 an acre, according to data supplied by the Federal offices.

It was through the Indian agency that Mr. Campbell arranged his land rentals and since the checks he received for cooperating in the invalidated A. A. A. production-control programs indicate a per acre yield of about 7 bushels of wheat, it would appear that he received about $1 a bushel for each bushel he refrained from producing in the 3 years of the A. A. A.

This disclosure climaxed the unfolding of further details of A. A. A. benefit payments and related developments in the Federal administrative and legislative branches. These included:

A statement by Secretary Wallace in which he contended that "politics" was alone responsible for the demand for information on past A. A. A. benefit checks and the Vandenberg resolution calling for a report of all such payments above $10,000.

JUSTICE RETURNED MONEY

A report that Supreme Court Justice Willis Van Devanter, who, with a majority of his colleagues, handed down the decision that voided the A. A. A., had sent back to that agency about $100 it paid his farm for compliance in the wheat-control programs.

Release of a letter from Secretary Wallace to the Senate Agriculture Committee in which he placed the highest wheat benefit payment to a farmer under a single A. A. A. contract at $78,634. This was to correct a statement made in the Secretary's first preliminary report to the committee recently in which he said the largest such payment was $29,398.

An attempt by Senator VANDENBERG to call up in the Senate his resolution for reports on the A. A. A. payments, a move that was halted by Senator ROBINSON, the majority leader, who would not permit action on the measure in the absence of Senators who, he said, wanted to be heard on the subject.

The first piece in the story of A. A. A. payments to Mr. Campbell came from Secretary Wallace himself. In his preliminary report on the A. A. A. benefits he told the Senate committee that a Montana farmer had received $22,325 in 1933–34 for bringing under the voluntary-control program lands rented from the Indians.

The total amount received by Mr. Campbell, only roughly estimated by officials in the absence of detailed figures on the 1935–36 wheat program, placed him in the ranks of the 12 largest individual beneficiaries of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, it was said.

INDIAN BUREAU ALSO BENEFITS

In addition to the more than $50,000 paid Mr. Campbell for his retired Indian lands, records of one Federal agency showed that he was entitled to about $5,000 in A. A. A. payments for bringing his own privately owned Montana farm under the control programs.

The Indian Bureau itself was said by officials to have been a substantial beneficiary from the A. A. A. payments to Mr. Campbell because of its guardianship of the Indian-owned lands. One official placed the amount paid the Federal agency as a result at $5,000, while another said it would probably be nearer $8,000.

Brought under the A. A. A. wheat-control program by Mr. Campbell were 16,519 acres of land rented from the Indians and 2,155 acres of his own farm. The exact terms of his contract with the A. A. A. for land retirement could not be learned tonight, but Indian Bureau officials said that land similar to that operated by Mr. Campbell could be rented for from 50 cents to $1.50 an acre, depending upon its productivity.

The "wheat king" received $18,400 for not planting a part of his rented acres in 1934. That year the A. A. A. program called for a reduction of 15 percent under what had been normally planted, and checks were based on 55 percent of average yields or "domestic allotment" at a rate of 30 cents a bushel.

Since Mr. Campbell actually withheld from cultivation about 2,470 acres of the land he rented from the Indians, and his payments from the A. A. A. totaled $18,400 on that portion, the officials indicated that he had received about $7 an acre for his cooperation.

Mr. Campbell's A. A. A. payments were largely on the Indian acreage in all years. He had two large Indian tracts, and received in 1933–34 crop payments on the largest tract $16,360; on the smaller Indian tract, $2,049; and on his own land, $2,727.

In 1934–35 payments he received for the large tract, $17,279; the small tract, $2,164; and on his own land, $2,831.

Some of the Indian acreage was operated on a sharecropper basis, as A. A. A. records indicated "landlord" checks paid to the Crow Reservation agent of $1,817 in one year and $1,920 another year for the large acreage.

In 1935 Secretary Wallace lifted all spring-wheat restrictions, permitting cooperators to get benefit payments without any performance.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the article indicates that there are questions involved in these major Triple A benefit payments which seriously and in an impersonal, unpartisan sense ought to be studied for the benefit of whatever advantageous information may flow therefrom as we proceed to continue this method of farm relief.

I think it makes very little difference what my own voting record in the Senate has been in respect to previous problems which have been in the Senate forum.

My able friend from Arkansas has honored me by a considerable discussion of that record. I would not change the record in any respect if I could, and I think in a word I can demonstrate its complete consistency, if that be of the slightest interest to any Senator.

The Senator from Arkansas refers to the fact that I voted for the Jones-Costigan Act, the Sugar Control Act, under which a portion of the benefit payments have been made in large and staggering sums. I certainly did; and, Mr. President, the fact that I voted for it gives me a double right to be critical in respect to what has happened under it. Why did I vote for it? I desire to read from the RECORD, and I read from page 6803 of the RECORD of April 18, 1934.

The Jones-Costigan bill was then pending for a final vote in the Senate after many of us had sought repeatedly to amend it, after many of us had fought many phases of it to the utmost limit, and had succeeded in having it changed in many important particulars. This, however, is what I said on the floor of the Senate, and I read it to the Senator from Arkansas and my other colleagues:

Mr. President, those who have a right to speak for domestic sugar farmers and processors in this emergency reluctantly announce that they have no choice except to ask for the passage of the bill—indeed, any bill—because of the impending purpose of the President to reduce the sugar tariff. Against the latter hazard their only relative hope is the substitution of quota protection.

In such circumstances any quotas, however hostile, are better than none at all. They must take what they can get. But let this be plain, namely, that they are not free agents when they make their choice. It has been said that they choose with a gun at their head. That is the truth. It is a double-barreled gun. One barrel is loaded with impending sugar-tariff reductions, menacingly promised by the President; the other barrel is loaded with unrestricted Philippine imports until such time as the new and inadequate Philippine bill becomes effective.

In other words, Mr. President, if we must linger for a moment upon this ancient history of cold-blooded facts as in terms of politics, if that be the interpretation that must be put upon it, the cold-blooded fact is that the great President of the United States in his Baltimore speech preceding his election said that under no circumstances would he reduce a single agricultural tariff. It was a positive statement, without reservation or equivocation; but the fact is that within 18 months thereafter he twice reduced the tariff upon sugar, affecting in a fundamental degree the farming interests in 16 States of the Nation. Sugar was the only commodity included within the Triple A benefits which was not a surplus commodity. Sugar beets and domestic sugar cane were placed in the Triple A bill as a direct and specific compensation for the fact that the tariff to which they admittedly were entitled had been removed for the benefit of encouraging Cuban trade.

When the matter finally came to a vote upon the floor of the Senate, the vote was a shotgun vote; and the only chance on earth the domestic sugar-beet farmer had under those circumstances was to take what he could get. The best proof of my own good faith in that aspect is that I introduced, and there is pending in the Finance Committee today, a substitute for the Jones-Costigan Act, which does not involve the payment of a single penny of benefits from the Treasury of the United States, and which involves solely giving to the American farmer the American market, giving to him a right to produce to his own capacity that which his own fellow Americans can consume.

Mr. President, my able friend finds some sort of inconsistency in the fact that I am in favor of publicity respecting money going out of the Treasury, although I was not in favor of publicity for loans presumably to be repaid, and publicity upon the income-tax reports of private citizens. I think he knows just as well as I do that there is no remote analogy between the two situations. If there were any analogy, I should be asking for publicity for the loans that are made to farmers through the various and multiple farm-loan agencies which exist in the country. I am not asking for any information respecting the private affairs of the farmer in respect to anything which originates within the individual citizen's private rights. My position today is just as consistent as it was then. I shall never be found seeking to prevent any publicity for one nickel that goes out of the Public Treasury of the United States.

Insofar as any discussion of income-tax publicity is concerned, insofar as concerns any consideration to be given to the submission that the income-tax payer ought to make to scrutiny in respect to any dispute regarding his taxes, I may as well say here as at any other time that I distinctly dissent from the Presidential Executive order issued on June 10, 1933, under which the Attorney General alone, in the secrecy of his own chambers, may now compromise and dismiss suits for the collection of income taxes, whereas prior to the issuance of the Executive order it had to be done by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the advice and consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, and with the recommendation of the Attorney General. If Senators wish to talk about publicity in respect to any phase of the income-tax problem, I wish to talk for a moment about an Executive order which strikes down at least a portion of the protection which heretofore has existed in respect to the composition of these suits.

As I was saying, Mr. President, it seems to me that what my record is or is not has remote bearing upon whether or not the Senate should pass a resolution frankly asking for information regarding a disbursement of public funds made by a nonelective officer of the Government, under his own formula, and when, where, and how he pleases, to the tune of $1,000,000,000. I have been amazed for the past 6 weeks that there should have ever been the remotest thought of opposing or retarding any such inquiry.

Now, apparently, an effort is to be made to load down the resolution with a number of amendments. That will not embarrass me in the slightest degree. I am in favor of the adoption of any Senate resolution which asks for legitimate information from any department of the Government whenever any one Senator of the United States rises and asks for it; and I shall never be in favor of subjecting him to a gauntlet of battle in order to get the information. Senators may put on all the amendments they desire, seeking all the information they wish, and I hope some additional amendments will be put on from this side of the aisle if the resolution is to become an omnibus. Let the same rule apply to our amendments from this side of the aisle that applies to your own. Let there be light, regardless of whence it comes. If this resolution is to be an omnibus, let us fill all the seats in the omnibus. Let us first agree to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], and then to the one submitted by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], asking for a full disclosure of the W. P. A. pay rolls up and down the land. Let us take that resolution out of the committee where apparently it has been given an anesthetic. Let us add that to the omnibus, and let us add any other resolutions seeking information that anybody wishes to put on. I know of no way in which the Senate can proceed intelligently in the absence of all the information it can secure from the departments.

With respect to the amendment submitted by my able and genial friend from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], I will say that I have no objection to it. I am totally at a loss to understand how, in the final analysis, it is going to be possible for anybody, even a man as conveniently and expediently generous as is the chairman of the Tariff Commission, to make a clinical break-down of trade statistics to identify the precise element of tariff benefit, and where it is allocated as between labor and capital and the ultimate public welfare. But, bless your heart, if you want to make the effort to get the information, I have not the slightest objection in the world. I fail to see its connection with the Triple A inquiry I have made; but perhaps there is a connection, Mr. President, because a rather amazing thing happened a week ago Sunday which would indicate that there may be something in this dual contemplation respecting the Triple A and the tariff. Perhaps there is something which ought to be probed.

I was tremendously interested to discover that Mr. Chester C. Davis, who is still, I believe, the Administrator of the Triple A, sent a self-written interview to the United States about 2 weeks ago, to be released, under a Berlin date line, on April 18 for publication in the Sunday newspapers of that week. Let me tell the Senate, before I read portions of this article of Mr. Davis, what happened to the article, because it will at least excite your curiosity if it fails to challenge your suspicion. As nearly as I can discover, there was only one newspaper in America that published this article, to wit, the Newark Sunday Call, published at Newark, N. J. Why did not any other newspaper publish it? Well, I think I can tell you about that. No other newspaper published it because on the afternoon when it was intended for publication and for release a cablegram was received from Mr. Davis, then in London, requesting that it be withdrawn, and unfortunately for him, but fortunately for our illumination, the notice arrived too late to stop the publication in the Newark Call.

Why Mr. Davis changed his mind about this article I leave to you. Perhaps he concluded that the things he was reporting were not so. Perhaps, on the other hand, a carbon copy of his article also went to his high superior, to the Secretary of Agriculture, at the same time it went to the Associated Press, and perhaps it was there discovered what an astonishing, amazing, and totally unanticipated breach had suddenly arisen between the stated opinions of Mr. Chester Davis respecting the agricultural problem and the tariff problem in connection therewith on his part and that which is persistently proclaimed by the administration. Now, listen, quoting Mr. Davis:

> I am afraid that those who hope for a suddenly revived European market for our farm products as the immediate solution to our American agricultural problem are destined for disappointment. All over Europe there is bad news for the American farmer or exporter who hopes to regain the great market he enjoyed in this part of the world a decade ago.

That is precisely what I have insisted upon time and time again in the course of tariff debates upon this floor; precisely the condition which denies the policy that is preached to us by our good friends across the aisle and down Pennsylvania Avenue that the sum total of our economic hope is to rely upon a fertilized export trade which is to bring us back to our prosperous normalcy. Mr. Davis says it cannot be done.

I quote further from Mr. Davis:

Under the rising surge of nationalism and the continued threat of war, with the possibility of food supplies choked off by blockade, the leading countries in western Europe are striving to become self-sufficient and, as far as possible, to produce their own foodstuffs.

Of course that is true; and it is perfectly absurd to contemplate that we ever again, within this generation at least, can recapture that section of our export trade.

Continuing to quote:

Nearly every nation has been developing national programs involving trade regulations and other artificial means to check the inflow of foreign products and to stimulate greater production on its own acres—no matter how immediately unprofitable such production may be.

Now listen:

I see no—

This is Chester C. Davis speaking in an interview which was not supposed to be published—Chester C. Davis speaking—the head of the Triple A—

I see no sense wasting our soil resources and great national heritage of productive and fertile soil to produce for a market we cannot have because of circumstances far beyond our control. * * *

These are stubborn facts—

Mr. Davis testifying—

These are stubborn facts that no amount of wishful thinking—

Did you ever suspect you would find that phrase in Mr. Davis' mouth?—

That no amount of wishful thinking in the United States will change, and they affect European export trade in western Europe and England in many lines, particularly food products and agricultural raw materials, which nationalistic policies over here seek to develop.

Just one more paragraph:

If I appear at this stage to emphasize the negative side of farm-trade prospects with Europe rather than the positive, it is because a constructive farm policy for our country must start, first, with a square look at the facts as they exist.

That is all I have been asking for for a month, Mr. President, that we take "a square look at the facts as they exist." If we take "a square look at the facts as they exist", we are driven to the inevitable conclusion, as is Mr. Davis, when once he reaches the other side of the ocean, that we pursue a mirage when we try to build our economic restoration upon the basis of a recaptured foreign trade in any such degree as heretofore existed; and that applies equally to the agricultural situation to which Mr. Davis is attached.

I ask that this entire article may be printed in the RECORD, in order to save time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD.

The article is as follows:

EUROPE CLOSING DOOR UPON UNITED STATES FARM PRODUCTS—CHESTER DAVIS SEES NO HOPE FOR BOOM LIKE THAT 10 YEARS AGO

(Chester C. Davis, Administrator for the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, now is touring Europe on a mission for President Roosevelt to determine how nationalistic tendencies and the threat of war will affect present and future markets of the American farmer. He has visited Great Britain, Holland, Luxemburg, and Germany, and later will see Sweden, Belgium, the Balkan countries, Italy, and France. He has authorized the following interview for the Associated Press.)

BERLIN, April 18.—I am afraid that those who hope for a suddenly revived European market for our farm products as the immediate solution to our American agricultural problem are destined for disappointment. All over Europe there is bad news for the American farmer or exporter who hopes to regain the great market he enjoyed in this part of the world a decade ago.

Under the rising surge of nationalism and the continued threat of war with the possibility of food supplies choked off by blockade, the leading countries in Western Europe are striving to become self-sufficient and, as far as possible, to produce their own foodstuffs.

Nearly every nation has been developing national programs involving trade regulations and other artificial means to check the inflow of foreign products and to stimulate greater production on its own acres—no matter how immediately unprofitable such production may be.

MUST RECOGNIZE FACTS

Incidentally it is not for us to question the wisdom of such a policy; we must recognize the facts as they exist.

The tendency of first apparent in the British Isles. While we in the United States are driving to shift plowland to grass, the British are encouraging, through national programs, a shift from grass to plowland.

Agricultural self-sufficiency seems to be an ever more dominant policy on the Continent, where it entrenches behind import controls of a scope undreamed of a few years ago.

Controls undertaken as an economic policy are strengthened by the current apprehension of war. No Englishman ever will forget those black World War days when Britain, under the menace of the U-boat, was within 6 weeks of exhausted food supplies and starvation.

Germany likewise will not forget the fact that it was behind the lines it lost the war through crushing blockades that cut off its food supplies.

ONE LESSON LEARNED

Europe remembers that lesson better than she seems to remember some other lessons taught by the World War. Until peace finds a home in Europe again the outlook for increased takings of our cereal and meat staples appears none too bright.

I am concerned with what these changes mean to the American farmer. We plowed up 50,000,000 acres to grow wheat and meat for Europe from 1914 to 1919. They will not be needed to the same extent for that purpose again.

I see no sense wasting our soil resources and great national heritage of productive and fertile soil to produce for a market we cannot have because of circumstances far beyond our control.

Nearly every country we have visited has supplemented its tariffs by import quotas on some commodities. Some nations have put in effect rigid exchange-control systems which put the Government in charge of every item of foreign trade. Germany is a notable example. Some countries have invoked outright embargoes.

STUBBORN FACTS

These are stubborn facts that no amount of wishful thinking in the United States will change and they affect American export trade in western Europe and England in many lines, particularly food products and agricultural raw materials, which nationalistic policies over here seek to develop.

The more progressive European countries are sick of quotas and control arrangements, but under the circumstances they find them necessary.

We are just beginning to realize in the United States that staggering as our war profits on agricultural commodities appeared during the World War, we lost in the end and were worse off afterward. We have not yet reorganized from the effects it left.

As far as staples are concerned, American subsidies looking toward dumping surpluses simply will not work, because the nations over here are equipped with all sorts of devices to offset them.

Subsidies will not enlarge quotas or break down embargoes.

Even in England, which until 1931 was the world's great free market, I cannot see anything to indicate a change in the national policy of protection for the home farmer and preference for the dominion farmer, at least as long as there is a possibility of European war.

NEGATIVE ASPECT STRESSED

There is no question of whether England or any other country likes this departure from its former trade policies. The conditions simply compelled the action.

If I appear at this stage to emphasize the negative side of farm-trade prospects with Europe rather than the positive, it is because a constructive farm policy for our country must start, first, with a square look at the facts as they exist.

What appears to be true of cereals and meat and fats certainly is not wholly true of tobacco, which has recently enjoyed an extraordinarily flourishing sale in England.

Other factors than those mentioned influence the cotton trade, and with certain of our smaller specialty crops some interesting possibilities may be developed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I think perhaps there is a vague and remote connection between the Triple A and the tariff in connection with my resolution. It is rather a nebulous, attenuated sort of relationship, but if the Senator from Kentucky wants to ask for tariff information in connection with my resolution, he is more than welcome to do so, and so far as I am concerned I shall not contest any amendment which seeks information. I simply say what Chester C. Davis said from London, let us get the facts; and I am reasonably certain that the Senate will not want to deny a quest for facts either in respect to large Triple A benefit payments or in respect to any other phase of the problem as it may subsequently develop. I am perfectly sure that the Senator from Arkansas, and the Senator from Kentucky, and all their colleagues across the aisle, will be willing that the resolution shall be adopted, and that we shall get the facts, and I only regret that it has been so exceedingly difficult to bring them to this state of mind.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have no desire to consume very much of the time of the Senate in discussing the pending resolution, but in view of some of the implications involved not only in the resolution itself but in the particular form of publicity which has been given to the introduction and the tendency of the resolution, which, I assume, has not been altogether uninspired by its author, I desire to make a few observations with respect to it, and with particular reference to the amendment I have offered, which I hope will be adopted and which I am glad the Senator from Michigan has agreed to support.

In the first place, Mr. President, there has been and there will always be a very definite connection between the welfare of the American farmer and the tariff laws that are in force either for his benefit or of which he is the victim. I recall in 1928, 1929, and 1930, when we had the tariff bill—which is now the law—under consideration, that, without regard to political affiliation—inasmuch as such a tariff bill was to be enacted—sincere, honest, and intelligent efforts were made to adjust whatever benefits might grow out of it to all classes of our people alike. I recall that after the election of 1928, which was held in November of that year, the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives began hearings on a new tariff law in December 1928. They held hearings almost all winter. President Hoover called an extraordinary session of Congress to consider the tariff; the House of Representatives passed a bill, which was sent here, and that measure consumed the almost undivided attention of both Houses of Congress from December 1928 to June 17, 1930, when the President signed the tariff bill which was enacted after that 18 or 19 months of deliberation.

I mention that in order to emphasize the fact that when the administration now in power came in on the 4th of March 1933 it was recognized that in the dilapidated and distressed condition of the American people at that time it was nothing short of folly to try, under those circumstances, to rewrite a tariff law having general application throughout the United States. There were more immediate considerations that had to demand our attention.

The effect of the tariff law upon agriculture may be disputed by men, depending upon their preconceived notions of tariffs and their ideas about protection and tariff for revenue and free trade, and all the theories that enter into a tariff bill, but there can be no dispute as to the condition of the American farmers and as to the status of our foreign trade on the 4th of March 1933, without regard to the causes that led up to that disastrous situation. In 1929 our commerce with other nations amounted to about $10,000,000,000. That involved large employment of American labor. It involved the sale of large quantities of American farm products as well as American factory products.

From 1929 to 1932 our foreign commerce declined from about $10,000,000,000 per year to $3,100,000,000 per year, and a considerable portion of that decline was represented by our inability to sell our export agricultural products which were piled up in the field or in the factories or in the granaries. Testifying before a committee of which I happened to be a member, Mr. Robert T. Lamont, who was Secretary of Commerce under Mr. Hoover, made the statement that the loss of that $7,000,000,000 of American commerce with the nations of the world was responsible for the loss of employment by more than 3,000,000 able-bodied American workingmen.

When we came to deal with the agricultural situation we were faced by the fact that the agencies of credit to the farmer had practically collapsed and ceased to function. During all of 1932 there was scarcely any loans at all made to the American farmer, resulting in half a million American farmers being immediately in danger of foreclosure, and our surplus products such as cotton, wheat, corn, livestock, tobacco, and other commodities were unsalable and were incapable of sale at least in part because of the terrific artificial barrier which had been erected through the Smoot-Hawley tariff law, which encouraged other nations to take similar action, each one in turn trying to lift the wall higher than its neighbor had lifted it, so as to create a sort of vacuum, commercially speaking. We had to deal with that condition. We could not remedy it, so far as tariffs were concerned, except in some artificial way.

Nobody will deny that the remedy which we applied to our agricultural program and our agricultural problem had to be artificial, just as the things which had produced that condition were artificial. We either had to decide that we would reduce our production of unsalable surpluses, or continue their production and, in the absence of foreign markets, dump them on our own domestic market and drive the prices of our products still further down.

It will be recalled that at that time cotton was selling for about 5 cents a pound, and a million bales of cotton were piled up in this country, for which we had no market. Wheat was selling in the summer of 1932 as low as 25 cents a bushel. Corn sold as low as 10 cents a bushel; pork sold as low as 2½ cents a pound; cattle sold as low as 3½ cents a pound. The price of tobacco in the United States, notwithstanding the fact that certain high qualities brought a very high price, was on the average less than 5½ cents a pound. The entire European market, with a few exceptions, had been closed to American tobacco. It so happens that in the State which I in part represent a large portion of what we call the dark-fired tobacco is exportable. About 85 percent of what we produce finds a market in other countries of the world.

When we came to consider what we would do for agriculture we either had to continue the production of these unsalable surpluses and, by dumping them on the domestic market, drive the price of the product still lower, or we had to find some artificial way by which we might reduce these unsalable surpluses by a reduction in production which meant a reduction in the acreage of the American farmer.

We all recall that the American Farm Board had been created during a previous administration and had sunk about $500,000,000, taken out of the Treasury of the United States, in a futile and ineffectual effort to revive American agriculture. Notwithstanding this fact, notwithstanding the sinking of half a billion dollars in this futile way, agriculture continued to decline, and the condition of the American farmer became worse and worse every day and every year. When the Democratic administration came into power and undertook to arrive at some conclusion by which it might give stimulation, even artificial stimulation if necessary, to the condition of the farmer, the Triple A, the agricultural-adjustment plan, was devised and became a law.

Under the Agricultural Adjustment Act and such other legislation as we enacted in behalf of the farmer, and under the improved conditions which were the result of that legislation, cotton increased in price from 5 cents a pound to 12 cents a pound. The American wheat grower, instead of being compelled to sell his wheat for 25 cents a bushel, sold it for 70 to 90 cents and as high as $1 a bushel, and it is now selling around a dollar a bushel for May wheat, and even July wheat is quoted above 90 cents as the prospective price for the American crop of wheat for the coming summer.

Corn went from 9 or 10 cents a bushel to 60 or 70 or 75 cents a bushel. Tobacco went from an average of less than 5½ cents a pound, taking the United States as a whole, to about 11 cents a pound. In the same proportion, pork and cattle and other products increased in price until, under the A. A. A. and the associated laws and the improvement in economic conditions which was produced by them, we were able, before the Supreme Court declared the A. A. A. law to be unconstitutional, to increase the net income of the American farmer by more than $3,000,000,000 per annum.

Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the Supreme Court decision. It is not material to this issue at all, except to say that the decision did not declare unlawful the tax we levied per se; it did not declare unlawful the reduction of crop production per se; but held that the combination of the tax and the inducement offered by the benefits that were to be paid out of the tax to individual farmers in the States, created a sort of national coercion on the farmers designed to bring about a crop production which we had not jurisdiction to bring about because it was a local matter and would have to be undertaken by local communities and the States.

After that decision was rendered, in order that we might not abandon our program of farm relief, in order that we might continue as long as it might be necessary to offset one artificial influence with another artificial influence in the way of increase in the rewards to agriculture, we enacted the Soil Conservation and the Domestic Allotment Act, under which the Department of Agriculture is now framing its program for the future.

There was nothing in the law that compelled any farmer to join hands with Uncle Sam in a voluntary agreement by which he would reduce production of corn or wheat or tobacco or cotton, and in return receive a benefit payment for the amount that he reduced his production. In other words, he was to receive a reward for the uncultivated acres by which he reduced his normal production of these basic crops which were designated in the act.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] has offered a resolution asking for information with respect to the payments to individual or corporate farmers in the United States who received more than $10,000 benefit by reason of these agricultural adjustments.

However, the remarks made by the Senator from Michigan indicate, I assume, that he believes in a sort of graduated benefit payment dependent entirely upon the amount of crop production or the size of the farmer's operation.

I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan—who seems temporarily to have departed the Chamber—under any voluntary system for farm relief where no farmer under any system or plan is compelled to join in the program, whether he thinks any real benefit will come to the average American farmer if all those who operate farms upon an enormous scale are not to be drawn into the program, but permitted to continue their larger production without regard to the agricultural-adjustment program which has been planned or may be planned by the Department of Agriculture that is now in office or any that may succeed it or exist hereafter.

What we were seeking to do was to reduce production. The primary object of the A. A. A. was not to reward any man in larger proportion than any other man or any other entity was to be rewarded for reduction in acreage.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the large producers had been encouraged to expand their production while the smaller producers were being contracted to reduce their production, the inevitable result would have been that there would have been a failure of the program, would it not?

Mr. BARKLEY. Absolutely; because if there were enough large producers who might retain their normal production or expand it to offset the production of the small producers, what we would have had would have been an agricultural stalemate, which would have resulted in no good to anyone.

Mr. ROBINSON. The large producers would have profited, because they would have had more to sell.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course.

Mr. ROBINSON. The small producers would have suffered, because they would have realized low prices in spite of the fact that they had reduced their production.

Mr. BARKLEY. Decidedly so; and they would not have received any compensatory reward for the voluntary reduction they made in order that they might join a Nation-wide movement to bring about an adjustment of production to consumption, in view of the world situation.

The Senator from Michigan, in his remarks a while ago, indicated that he believed in a graduated system of benefit payments depending upon the size of the operation, somewhat on the theory that the income tax is graduated according to the amount of the income which an individual or a corporation may earn in any year. That is totally beside the question. There is no relationship whatever between the present program of reduction of unsalable agricultural surpluses and taxing a man according to his ability to pay in a scheme of taxation designed to raise revenue for the Government. Although the Senator intimated that he favored such a system, when he thinks of the matter in a judicial and calm way, aside from any publicity or any reaction that may boost or inflate, artificially or otherwise, the reputation of any man here in view of the political situation which now exists, and when the theory is applied to the productions of his own State, and a law designed to regulate those productions is based upon the primary theory that if the farmer is to receive an increased reward for his labor the price of his product must be increased, and if the price is to be increased the unsalable surpluses must in some way be removed from the markets and not continue to hang as a cloud over the agricultural horizon, I dare say the Senator would not favor any such proposition as that, because it would work to the injury of his own State, as it would work to the injury of all farmers, for it would nullify and defeat the entire program.

Mr. President, I have no desire to enter into a tariff discussion. I have offered this amendment, which is designed to obtain from the Tariff Commission a list of all the corporations whose net income for 1934 was more than a million dollars, and which are manufacturing, selling, and distributing an article upon which there is a protective tariff in the present tariff law.

I do not think anyone can deny the connection between the farm situation as we found it in 1933 and the tariff laws which had been enacted. I do not think anyone can deny that for generations the American farmer has been bearing the burden of tariff taxation without any compensatory reward upon his part for the taxes he has indirectly paid for the benefit of industry. When we passed the Tariff Act of 1930 efforts were made in someway to adjust that difference, although everyone recognized the impossibility of a complete adjustment. The Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933 has been described as the tariff act of the American farmer. Indirectly it was, because it did seek to offer him some compensation for the burden which he willingly bore out of his meager earnings, and thus assist him in the solution of his own domestic agricultural problems.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understood from the argument of the Senator from Michigan that he contends that it is impossible now to increase our foreign trade. I think the figures will show, as the Senator from Kentucky has mentioned, that the imports and exports of the United States dwindled to some $3,000,000,000 in 1932.

Mr. BARKLEY. In 1932; yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the statistics will show that that trade has increased up to almost $5,000,000,000 today.

Mr. BARKLEY. There has been an increase; and I will say to the Senator that while we recognize, in the emergent circumstances which have existed since the depression began, the impossibility in a year or a year and a half of Congress writing a general tariff act, Congress followed the example of previous administrations from the very beginning of the history of our Government in 1792, it followed the example of at least three Republican administrations in the McKinley Act and in the Dingley Act in authorizing the President, not as a matter of tariff, not as a matter of taxation, but in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce between the United States and other nations, to enter into trade agreements designed to open up markets in some parts of the world, wherever a fair and equitable agreement might be made for some of the surplus products of the American farm and the American factory.

But if it be true, as Mr. Davis says in the interview quoted by the Senator from Michigan, that it is nothing more than a midsummer night's dream to hope to recover the markets of the world for American agriculture, then it becomes more important that we in someway regulate our own production so that we shall not again be faced with an unsalable surplus which would have to be dumped upon the American market and would drive down still further the price of American products.

So the very interview quoted by the Senator from Michigan in support of his own argument is a stronger argument in favor of a program of curtailment of all the export products for which we now have no market and for which the Senator says we can hope to have no market in the immediate future.

If the Senator from Michigan is so solicitous about all the farmers who have received more than $10,000 by reason of their willingness to enter into voluntary contracts with the United States Government and with each other, and now is so willing that we shall also seek information with respect to the names of those who have net incomes of more than a million dollars to which contribution is made by the artificial wall which has kept our products from the markets of the world, I am wondering why he did not become so generous when he introduced his resolution instead of now being willing to accept it as an amendment which has been offered to his resolution.

I think it will be an easy matter for the Tariff Commission, through its access to the Treasury Department, the Department of Agriculture, and other agencies of the American Government, to furnish to the Senate and to the country the names of industrial corporations whose net annual income has been more than a million dollars, while we are undertaking to discourage the little farmer or to make him discontented because he received only one thousand or two thousand or five hundred dollars because of his small sacrifice, while seeing in blazing headlines that some great farmer, some corporate farmer out in the West or in the South or in Michigan or somewhere else has been able, because of the large curtailment involved in his operations, to receive more than $10,000 or $20,000 or $50,000 or $100,000.

My information is that in 1933 there were only 46 American farmers or American corporations, or combined individual and corporate farmers, who received anything like an enormous amount of benefits because of their curtailment. But why is it that the Senator from Michigan now, in this campaign year of 1936, is so anxious to expose what a few farmers received out of the Treasury of the United States in a great crop-reduction program, but was unwilling to expose in the beginning those who had been able to fatten because of their power to use the taxing agencies of the Government in an indirect way to levy tribute upon the very farmers in whose behalf we have undertaken to work out some relief?

It is a source of great pleasure to me, at least, that the Senator from Michigan is willing that we shall receive some of the information that is reposed in the Tariff Commission with respect to great industrial corporations which have been benefited by an artificial process, while at the same time he seeks to expose and seeks to embarrass and seeks to create resentment among the great mass of small farmers because they see in some newspaper headline a story that some great farmer has been able to receive fifty or one hundred or two hundred thousand dollars as a reward for his sacrifice.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the resolution offered by the Senator from Michigan. I hope the amendment I have offered will be agreed to, and inasmuch as the Senator agrees to it, I presume it will be. I dare say these two sets of information from the Tariff Commission and the Department of Agriculture, which are inseparably related in their antecedents and in their background, will show the American people something of our efforts to do a service to the great body of American farmers without embarrassment, without insinuation, without any charge that we are being actuated by favoritism toward one class as against another.

In my judgment, there can be no sound farm program of reduction of crop production that does not take in the largest farmers of the Nation on the same basis that we expect the smaller farmers to be actuated in their reduction and their sacrifice, in order that the whole body of farm life may be elevated, and the rewards for agriculture may be more remunerative and more satisfactory, which will enable the farmers of the Nation to pay their debts, and to buy some of the things produced in the great industrial centers, under which we hope to acquire a general, widespread and permanent prosperity upon a just basis and a firm foundation.

Mr. BYRNES obtained the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Has there been any order entered that committee amendments should be first considered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No order to that effect has been entered, but that is the usual practice.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I do not wish to speak to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. In fact, I intend to occupy the floor only a short time.

We have had the pleasure of hearing two speeches today from candidates for the Republican nomination for the Presidency. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] first addressed the Senate. He is my candidate, and I wish to enter my emphatic protest against the seeming studied effort on this side of the aisle to ignore my candidate.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] announced himself in favor of publicity. I believe him. I believe he is in favor of publicity from now until the convention. He came out boldly in favor of publicity. But he said not one word about the controlling issue in the coming campaign, which was so clearly presented today by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON]. That issue is dog food.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I should like to inquire as to what has become of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan is in the lobby just outside the door, and the Senator from Iowa, I am glad to say, has returned to the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask unanimous consent that a page be sent out to advise the Senator from Michigan that we are considering his resolution.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from Michigan has returned to the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator no doubt is familiar with the old quatrain:

> He who fights and runs away
> May live to fight another day;
> But he who is in battle slain
> Can never rise and fight again.

[Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNES. I thank the Senator. The candidates have returned. As a matter of fact, my only objection to the Senator from Michigan is that, with the opportunity presented to come out in an open declaration of his views on the subject of dog food, he said not one word in his 30-minute address in the Senate about that all-important subject.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], my candidate, presented the issue clearly. He presented it eloquently and with great force, and, having something of the love of publicity of which the Senator from Michigan has spoken, saw to it that there would be no mistake about this dog-food issue being carried to the country. Therefore there was sent to the newspapers of the country today from the Republican National Committee, with instructions to be released after the address of the Senator from Iowa was delivered, the sheet which I hold in my hand.

Some of the Members of the Senate will be surprised at what the newspapers are going to publish tomorrow morning for the enlightenment of the people of the Nation. They will be surprised, as I am, because I came upon the Senate floor about 1 o'clock and I saw about three Senators on the Democratic side of the Senate and about three on the Republican side of the Senate. Of the three on the Republican side there was the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr.

BORAH], who has a little interest in this nomination business; the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who likewise is interested; and the minority leader, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY]. With the exception of the Senator from Oregon only the candidates were present, and I must say that the Senator from Idaho has not yet expressed himself on this issue which has been projected into the campaign by the Senator from Iowa and the Republican National Committee.

This is what the country will read tomorrow:

WASHINGTON, April 27.—In a sensational address before the Senate—

[Laughter.]

That can be proved by each of the three candidates for the Republican nomination, the Senator from Iowa himself, the Senator from Michigan, and the Senator from Idaho. I do not know what the testimony would be from the three Senators who occupied their seats on the Democratic side of the Senate. But the Senator from Idaho was present, and I know he will be surprised when he reads in the great newspapers of the country tomorrow that—

In a sensational address before the Senate, United States Senator L. J. DICKINSON, of Iowa, today laid bare a condition under which poor people throughout the United States had been forced to eat diseased and contaminated food which the speaker described as "literally unfit for even dogs to eat."

Mr. President and Members of the Senate, no more serious issue could be presented to the country. The people have resorted to the eating of dog food, according to this candidate for the Republican nomination. He said it in a most forceful way.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. The announcement from the Republican National Committee reads:

The white-haired Iowan arrived in the Senate Chamber with cans of prepared dog food which, he explained, people were actually eating because the Government permitted the manufacturers to advertise on the labels that it was "fit for human consumption." The cans and labels were exhibited to the Senators with actual photographs of some of the plants, showing the processes of manufacture.

Of course, Senators did not see the exhibit. I do not know where the Senator from Iowa has been for the last hour. I have looked over on the other side, and I was satisfied that he forgot to bring that dog food to the Senate this morning. He may have been hunting it, and I will now ask him. Has the Senator the dog food?

Mr. DICKINSON. I have the dog food. It is in my office, and I also have pictures of it, if the Senator would like to see them. I did not care to present them on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. BYRNES. But the newspapers will publish that he did exhibit them on the floor. I have for years known the distinguished Senator, and have had for him real affection. I regret to hear him say that he is now storing dog food in his office [laughter], because the paper issued from the Republican National Committee tells the people of the United States that the Senator said in the conclusion of this sensational address:

Gentlemen of the New Deal, while you are indulging your dream of utopia, please, out of the billions of our money you are so recklessly spending, spare us the paltry few pennies needed to enforce the pure-food laws, so we may know the third-class food you compel us to eat, at least, is clean food.

I thought that was only rich and riotous rhetoric. I did not know the Senator was eating it. [Laughter.] Yet the Senator says that he now has it in his office. Well, I hope that the labels on the cans are correct, and that it is fit for human consumption.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. I wish to suggest that the record is right here. It is taken under your pet Blue Eagle N. R. A. The evidence is available. The Senator cannot laugh the thing out of the Senate for the reason that the evidence shows that 100,000,000 cans of dog food are being consumed by the human race in the United States now, and you cannot laugh that off the floor of the Senate.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I am not asking that it be laughed off. I am demanding that the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Idaho express themselves on this momentous issue. I am not in favor of it being laughed off the floor.

This paper from the Republican National Committee refers to the Senator as "the white-haired Iowan." I love to look at his white hair, too. Whenever they sent out this statement of the "sensational speech", yesterday or the day before, they knew it would create a sensation. I take it seriously. I resent the fact that other Senators on this side of the aisle should reply to the speech of the Senator from Michigan and utterly ignore the speech of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I want the Senate first to know what is going to be published tomorrow about the speech. This is the next statement that was written by the Republican National Committee. Here is the story:

Sarcastically—

I can hear him now—

Sarcastically DICKINSON referred to the Roosevelt cure of slaughtering food animals, restricting the growing of grain.

Then it reads:

Every gangster, every counterfeiter, every dope peddler now incarcerated in a Federal penitentiary not only lives better—

The writer of the Republican National Committee put these words in—he said with studied deliberation.

Now, that is good! When the writer was picturing this thing yesterday he knew that my candidate, when he reached that point in his speech, would speak with "studied deliberation." [Laughter.]

He said with studied deliberation, "The man who is in the penitentiary has actually twice as much to eat as the average of our free citizenship in this year of Roosevelt—1936."

I do not know what penitentiary the Senator has been in, but I am glad to know that the unfortunates sentenced to serve time in the penitentiary are having such excellent menus afforded them. I trust he is correct in his statement. But I hope it will not prove an incentive to crime.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield now? I wish to get permission to insert something in the RECORD.

Mr. BYRNES. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the resolutions of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association with reference to the Black investigation. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator should try to divert me from his dog-food issue. I wish to call attention to the fact that this writer from the Republican National Committee says that the Senator, after speaking with "studied deliberation", held aloft a can of uninspected dog food for the edification of the Senate. [Laughter.]

The Senator from Iowa is leaving the Chamber, Mr. President. I hope—I know he will bring back that dog food. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I do not object to this sheet from the Republican National Committee. My only objection to it is that it pictures to the country that the United States Senate Chamber has been turned into one of these county fair exhibits, with canned dog food scattered all around the Senate. The Senator from Iowa did not do it. He would go a long way for the "brain trust", but he could not go that far. The real issue at this time is not canned food; it is canned speeches. [Laughter.]

Anyone listening to the Senator reading that speech and knowing how freely he discusses all questions must have recognized, as I did in the short time I listened to him, that he was not quite familiar with the speech. I think I know where it comes from. That speech comes from the "brain trust." Only Professor Saxon's outfit with the distinguished professors down at the Republican National Committee would project such an issue into the campaign. The Republican Committee has had a rather difficult time finding an issue. With the coming of the professors we wondered what the issue was to be. Now we know the issue—dog food.

I am satisfied that it was born in the brain of Prof. Asher Hobson, because we are advised by the Associated Press that until recently he was employed in the Department of Agriculture. Only a few weeks ago he was employed in the soil-conservation program as a liaison officer for the Central Statistical Board. He was also employed as an economist at quite liberal compensation. But just as soon as the contributions began to roll in from Delaware, from the State of Du Pont, and big money was available, the professor saw the light, and he transferred his scene of activities over to the Republican National Committee. It was ever the way of expert witnesses.

But the Republican National Committee chairman, Mr. Fletcher, did not know the professor. He said:

> Those who have joined us have done so in the belief that the policies of the Roosevelt administration are in violation of the teachings of experience and subversive of the fundamental principles of American tradition.

Professor Hobson only a few weeks ago was on the pay roll of the Roosevelt administration and was formulating plans for the soil-conservation program.

The Republican National Committee has issued another document—On Our Way. That was issued on Saturday. It has splendid pictures in it. Having come to the conclusion that millions of people in this country have no more sense than to eat dog food when it is labeled dog food, the Republican National Committee also came to the conclusion that there are so many people in the Republican Party who cannot read that they must send them pictures.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does not the Senator think that instead of worrying about dog food they ought to devote their attention to a little elephant food?

Mr. BYRNES. I think the elephant needs more nourishment than ever before in our political history. Now, I do not object to Mr. FLETCHER going to Harvard and getting one of the pupils of Dr. Frankfurter to come down here and establish a "brain trust." The good Lord knows that if there ever were a people on the face of the earth who were in need of brains of some kind it was the Republican National Committee. If these professors really are to furnish material for speeches, as we are told, it is an excellent thing and I hope they will continue to furnish material to the Senator from Iowa. Even though he is my candidate, there are times when I think he is in the need of a little assistance.

This funny paper is a wonderful thing. It says:

> Mr. Roosevelt's half-baked potato program was laughed out of existence by the American people.

That is a professor's idea of the Supreme Court decision which ended the potato-control program. However, when it is called "Mr. Roosevelt's half-baked potato program", Members of the Senate and of the House know that that program originated in the Congress. They know that among the gentlemen who espoused it most heartily was the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. They know that he led all the rest. My good friend, the Senator from Maine, was more interested in its passage than any other Member of the Senate.

I think the Senator from Idaho was in favor of it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what makes the Senator think so?

Mr. BYRNES. I understood so at the time. I should be delighted to be corrected if it is not so.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has stated that I was. What makes the Senator think so?

Mr. BYRNES. I said I thought he was. There was no roll call, and I understood at the time that the Senator was, but if the Senator from Idaho tells me that he was not, I shall be glad to accept his correction of my statement.

Mr. BORAH. It is true there was no roll call, but I advised my constituency over and over again that I believed the bill unconstitutional and unsound economically.

Mr. BYRNES. I accept the statement. That at least eliminates the candidate from the State of Idaho, and even though I have expressed my preference for the Senator from Iowa, I do not want to misquote my distinguished friend from the State of Idaho, for whom I have the greatest respect.

The Senator from North Carolina on this side offered the amendment. There was no roll call, but my friend the Senator from Maine expressed his great interest in the bill. But certainly the Senator from North Carolina had a very difficult time getting the Department of Agriculture to enforce the potato amendment. The executive departments were opposed to it. The professor who wrote the statement I quoted should have known better.

On the third page we find four pictures showing people in want, in distress, and the members of the Republican National Committee, which is sending out material to oppose all the efforts of the administration to give help to the hungry and to furnish jobs to those who are out of work, are picturing in this supplement unfortunates who are in need of medicine, unfortunates who are in need of jobs. I think there must be a lack of coordination between the professors, because when one looks at the picture of a woman, with four children gathered around her, in need of relief, he will believe that the efforts of this administration to give help to the needy throughout this country are to be commended and not condemned. He will condemn a political party that opposes appropriations for relief of human suffering.

On the last page is the following:

> As You Like It—Not by Shakespeare.

Some professor wrote that. One would know that. The one who wrote it is Professor Saxon, I am satisfied. The head of the "brain trust" must be the author of this literary gem:

> Do you like On Our Way? Thank you. So do we. We do not like Mr. Roosevelt's funny business either. You know how it is. Just when things begin to look better along comes somebody like Mr. Roosevelt and spoils everything.

That is the "brain trust's" idea of appealing to the people of this Nation. Mr. Roosevelt came along in March 1933. This "brain trust" wants the people to believe that things were looking better in March 1933. Think of that.

It will cause the mind of every reader of this funny paper issued by the Republican committee to revert to that time and conclude that if the highly paid "brain trust" can produce nothing more convincing than this funny paper which I hold in my hand that the sooner they stop the expenditure of the money of Mr. Du Pont for that purpose the better will it be for what is left of the Republican Party.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, consideration of Senate Resolution 265, which was submitted by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and which is now pending, presents to the Senate one question which may be very readily answered, and another deeper, more significant question which takes on the complexities of a problem.

I think there is no disposition present in the Senate to deny the Senator from Michigan the information he seeks. Certainly I know it is not my disposition to deny it to him, and I believe it is not the disposition of the Secretary of Agriculture to deny it.

In consideration of the relatively few large payments made under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, there should be an understanding of what the act itself sought to accomplish. The end sought to be achieved was a general and substantial improvement in agriculture by raising the level of farm prices as rapidly as possible back to "parity" or equality with nonfarm prices; and parity for most products was defined in the act as the relationship that prevailed in the pre-war years.

Since reasonable farm prices and enormous surpluses do not exist side by side, and since the markets for farm products were bogged down in 1932 and early 1933 by immense unsalable supplies of farm products, the act sought to restore the farm-price level by a direct attack upon the cause, by control of production and removal and prevention of surpluses.

Mr. President, that act was not a partisan approach to the problem. I am less concerned with the partisan aspects of the resolution of the Senator from Michigan than I am with its implied attack upon the agricultural policies of the present administration. That it was not a partisan approach to the farm problem is shown by the following excerpts from the 1932 platforms of the two major political parties.

The Democratic platform of 1932 pledged:

> The enactment of every constitutional measure that will aid the farmers to receive for their basic farm commodities prices in excess of cost.

The Republican platform of 1932 included the following paragraph:

> The fundamental problem of American agriculture is the control of production to such volume as will balance supply with demand. In the solution of this problem the cooperative organization of farmers to balance production and the tariff to hold the home market for American farmers are vital elements. The third element, equally as vital, is the control of the acreage of lands under cultivation as an aid to the efforts of the farmer to balance production.

To enable farmers to get together voluntarily and adjust their production, the act authorized benefit payments to cooperating producers to compensate them for smaller production and to assure a workable means of obtaining general cooperation in the plans. In other words, the benefit payments were the mainspring in the machinery for relating adjustment of farm production to increasing farm prices.

The act was intended to be, and was, a general effort to raise and strengthen the whole farm price structure as a means of lifting agriculture out of its ruinous condition and laying the basis for industrial recovery as well.

In order to accomplish their fundamental purpose of a general rise in the farm price level, the adjustment programs had to have general cooperation among producers. This meant that not only small producers but also large producers would have to be attracted to the programs and join in them. Obviously there would be no chance for the farmers to control production if only the small farmers should participate and all the largest growers, staying out, should expand their production without limit, thus breaking down the program.

All farmers understood the purpose of the benefit payments. They viewed them as a mechanism necessary to carry out a practicable operation in production control.

Congress also understood this purpose. We assumed when we passed the act that the plan would not work if the payments were disbursed on any other basis than as a uniform compensation to farmers for the extent of their production adjustment, whatever that extent might be.

Therefore, as passed by Congress, the act made no provision whatever for varying the rates of payment in proportion to the size of the producer. The act authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to make rental and benefit payments at rates considered by him to be fair and reasonable. But there was not a line in the act to indicate that rates should be stepped up for small producers or stepped down for large producers. No provisions for progression of rates as to small producers or regression of rates for large producers were included in the amendments to the act passed in August 1935. The assumption underlying both the act and the amendments was that the rates would be uniform.

So the act worked out, according to its own terms, in the payment of rates which were uniform per unit of adjusted production, and hence it resulted in the payment of large sums to the relatively small number of exceptionally large producers in each of the adjustment programs. Naturally the comparatively few large payments now appear especially large when we read in the newspapers 3 years' payments lumped into one figure without any inkling that the sum was spread over both landlord and tenants. I read a story in an excellent newspaper the other day which told about a $78,000 payment to "a wheat farmer" without any indication whatever that the sum mentioned really represented two payments, and that instead of going to "a wheat farmer", as the story related, $49,000, or nearly two-thirds of the total, was divided among 50 wheat farmers who were tenants of the parent company and who were entitled to share in the benefit payment in the same ratio as they shared in the crop. So the great $78,000 payment to "a wheat farmer" turned out to be 51 payments, 50 of which, making up $49,000, went to the 50 tenant farmers, leaving $29,000 for the company owning the land.

Large payments were most common in those branches of agriculture in which large-scale farming is a most firmly established practice, as for example, cane sugar and rice.

These large payments are a symptom of a national agricultural malady—concentration of ownership and control of the resources of farm production, particularly in certain special branches of agriculture.

Now, Mr. President, I will give specific figures of benefit payments in the case of cotton, corn-hog, wheat, tobacco, rice, peanut, and sugar producers. It will be found from the figures that only a very small fraction of the benefit payments as to each basic commodity went to large corporations or large growers and that by far the greater part of the money paid out by A. A. A. went to the small or average producers.

In the case of cotton, only 46 rental and benefit payments out of 1,031,549 paid out in the 1933 program exceeded $10,000. Altogether, these 46 payments totaled $818,656, or seven-tenths of 1 percent of the $112,794,039 paid to all farmers.

In the case of corn-hogs, in 1934, the year in which largest payments were made under the corn and hogs adjustment programs, there were 19 corn-hog contracts on which total payments were in excess of $10,000. This was out of a total of 1,155,294 contracts accepted under the program for that year. In 1935 only two payments were made in excess of $10,000. In this connection reference is made to page 7 of Secretary Wallace's letter of April 4 to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

In the case of wheat, a preliminary check—and again reference is made to page 7 of Secretary Wallace's letter to the Senator from South Carolina—disclosed seven wheat contracts under which a total of more than $10,000 had been paid in second 1934 and first 1935 payments; which represented a year of the wheat-adjustment program. At the date this check was made, however, second 1934 and first 1935 payments had not yet been made on certain of the large contracts. A later and more complete check, which reached back into the year represented by the second 1933 and first 1934 payments, showed that a total of more than $10,000 had been paid on 16 different contracts for this year of the wheat-adjustment program. These 16 contracts were out of a total of approximately 580,000 contracts in effect for that year.

In the case of tobacco, the total number of contracts in all tobacco programs in 1934 was 288,908. The largest 1934 payment under a tobacco contract was $41,454, made to a Florida concern operating 49 farms. The second largest payment under a contract in the 1934 tobacco programs called for payments of $20,530.91 that year; the third largest was for $16,843.79; the fourth largest for $15,450.38; and the fifth largest for $13,263.20. In other words, out of the 288,908 tobacco contracts in effect that year, only five paid as much as $13,263.20. (See p. 8 of Secretary Wallace's letter of Apr. 4 to Senator SMITH.)

In the case of rice, 19 out of 10,659 rice contracts in effect for 1935 amounted to more than $25,000. All these contracts belonged to corporate landlords and canal companies which furnished land and/or water to large numbers of producers on a share basis. One company, for instance, operated through 650 share-tenants. (See p. 9 of Secretary Wallace's letter of Apr. 4 to Senator SMITH.)

In the case of peanuts, out of a total of 40,000 contracts in the peanut-production adjustment program, the largest payment was less than $3,000 under the adjustment contract. (See p. 9 of Secretary Wallace's letter of Apr. 4 to Senator SMITH.)

In the case of sugar, out of a total of about 77,000 sugar-beet contracts, benefit payments under 26 contracts exceeded $10,000. Because of the corporate production common in the sugarcane industry, payments exceeding $10,000 were called for in a larger number of sugarcane contracts, both in the continental United States and in the insular possessions. A detailed statement of the larger individual payments under sugarcane contracts is given in pages 10 through 16 of Secretary Wallace's letter of April 4 to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. President, of course it is true that big farmers benefited along with little farmers, as the large payments received by a few of them show; but the all-important thing to bear in mind is that the trend of farm foreclosures up to 1933 was reversed by the great improvement in farm income as shown by the statement which will be appended to my remarks. In 2 years, from March 15, 1933, to March 15, 1935, the number of forced farm sales declined almost 50 percent. Farm bankruptcy cases concluded fell off 20 percent in the year ending June 30, 1934, from the number of the previous year. Trend of farm sales was to farmer buyers instead of to bankers and insurance companies. In 1934, 70 out of every 100 farms sold by the Federal land banks were sold to farmers and only 30 percent to nonfarmers.

So I say that the greatest single service in checking the loss by farmers of their lands was performed by the Roosevelt administration and by the A. A. A. in its big-scale and successful effort to improve farm prices and improve farm income.

Forced by the decision of the Supreme Court in the Hoosac Mills case to adopt other measures for agriculture, Congress in February last enacted the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, and programs have been launched under that act which are designed to continue improvement in farm income, without production control pending transition to a State basis, and with production control after that, if the farmers desire it. The legislation referred to, designed to increase farm income, will also help farmers retain the ownership of their farms. But, unfortunately, the Senator from Michigan opposed this measure, as he opposed the original A. A. A.

The Federal Government, through the Farm Credit Administration, has brought about an immense improvement in the agricultural-credit situation since 1932. Title II of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, against which the Senator from Michigan voted, was entirely devoted to legislative measures to improve the farm-credit condition that existed in 1932. Through loans to farmers at lower interest rates, thousands who otherwise would have lost their farms to banks or insurance and investment companies were enabled to retain them and to continue as independent farmers. Further improvements were made by the Farm Credit Act of 1935, but I notice that the Senator from Michigan was not sufficiently interested even to express himself on that legislation.

In conclusion, Mr. President, let it be stated that the Senator from Michigan not only did not put his hand to the plow to improve the condition of the farmer, but he tried to lock up the plow in the barn and thus perpetuate the tragic conditions existing during 13 years of his party's administration of national affairs.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement prepared by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, Division of Information, entitled "Farm Progress in the United States Under the Agricultural Adjustment Act."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARM PROGRESS IN THE UNITED STATES UNDER THE AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

Farm cash income up 58 percent * * * farm prices up 66 percent * * * farm wage rates up 27 percent * * * farm real-estate values up 8 percent * * *. Such is the 1935 record of agricultural change in the United States since early 1933.

The initiation of a long-time soil-conservation plan under the provisions of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, approved February 29, 1936, consequently finds American agriculture in a far better condition than it was before the passage of the Agricultural Adjustment Act in May 1933.

The attack through adjustment programs on the emergency problem that agriculture faced 3 years ago went far toward making it possible for the Nation now to turn its attention to a long-time soil-conservation program.

Because of the situation of the Nation's farmers in the spring of 1933, the major objective of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as framed by Congress, was to restore farm prices to their pre-war level of purchasing power and thereby to promote national recovery. To this end the program included reduction, through production-adjustment programs and other measures, of the price-depressing surpluses of major agricultural products that had piled up by the early part of 1933. Increased production of soil-improving and erosion-preventing crops was made possible and was encouraged through measures adopted under the act, but not until the emergency problem was at least partially solved could the raising of farm prices and the control of surpluses be subordinated to soil conservation as the first and paramount object of the Nation's agricultural program.

INCREASED FARM PRICES AND FARM PURCHASING POWER

The yearly average price of all groups of farm products increased 66 percent during the 1932–35 period, rising from 65 to 108 percent of the pre-war level. The low point occurred in March 1933, when farm prices averaged only 55 percent of the pre-war level, while in December 1935 they averaged 110 percent of that level. These figures do not include rental and benefit payments.

The gain in exchange value per unit of farm products was somewhat less than the gain in farm prices, since prices farmers pay for commodities used in living and production also advanced about 17 percent from 1932 to 1935. The exchange value per unit of farm products increased from 61 percent of the pre-war level in 1932 to 86 percent in 1935, a gain of about 41 percent.

In December 1935 farm prices were still 25 percent under their 1929 level, while industrial prices were only about 20 percent under that level.

Price changes on certain selected farm commodities are shown in table 1.

INCREASED FARM INCOME

Rise in farm prices since adjustment programs were put in effect has meant a substantial improvement in farm income. Cash income from farm production in the United States was $4,377,000,000 in 1932, $5,131,000,000 in 1933, $5,673,000,000 in 1934, $6,420,000,000 in 1935. In addition to this, farmers participating in the adjustment programs received cash income from the rental and benefit payments portion of their price of $278,000,000 in 1933, $594,000,000 in 1934, $480,000,000 in 1935.

Total farm cash income from production in 1935 was thus $6,900,000,000, an increase of $2,523,000,000, or nearly 58 percent, over the 1932 figure of $4,377,000,000. Rental and benefit payments related to 1935 production accounted for about $480,000,000 of this increase, or about 19 percent.

Between 1932 and 1935 the income from cotton, tobacco, wheat, corn, and hogs increased about 90 percent, including rental and benefit payments. This compares with an income increase of 43 percent for all other farm products. Including rental and benefit payments, the cash income of cotton farmers increased from $464,000,000 in 1932 to about $877,000,000 in 1935; that of wheat growers from $196,000,000 to approximately one hundred and eighty-one million; that of tobacco producers from $108,000,000 to about $254,000,000; and that of corn-hog raisers from $597,000,000 to approximately $981,000,000.

CASH INCOME AVAILABLE FOR FARM LIVING

Improvement in farm cash income from 1932 to 1935 was particularly significant in terms of cash income available for farm living. Cash available to agriculture from 1935 income, after making deductions for wages, operating expenses, taxes, and interest, is estimated at $3,575,000,000. This is the largest cash return available for farm living since 1929 and nearly two and a half times as large as the return for 1932. The cash return to agriculture as an industry from 1932 production was $1,473,000,000; from 1933 production, $2,548,000,000; and from 1934 production, $3,257,000,000.

IMPROVED FARM REAL-ESTATE SITUATION

A general upturn in farm real-estate values—the first since 1920—and a reduction in the frequency of distress sales have accompanied the increased farm prices and income. From its 1933 low of 73 percent (1912–14=100) the Bureau of Agricultural Economics index of estimated value per acre of farm real estate rose to 76 in the year ended March 15, 1934, and to 79 by the year ended March 15, 1935. The increasing prices of agricultural products, the expanded credit facilities of the Farm Credit Administration, and the Agricultural Adjustment programs contributed largely to this rise.

While there has been an increase in the number of voluntary farm real-estate sales and trades since 1932, there has been a decrease in the number of forced sales. In 1932, 16.2 farms per thousand were sold and traded voluntarily, while the number sold because of delinquent taxes, foreclosures, bankruptcies, etc., was 41.7 per thousand. But with the year ending March 15, 1935, while the number of voluntary farm real-estate sales and trades increased to 19.4 farms per thousand, the number of forced sales and related defaults decreased to 26.3 per thousand. Indications point to a still greater improvement in these prospects for the real-estate year ending March 15, 1936.

REDUCTION OF SURPLUSES

The primary problem before American farmers in 1933 was the reduction of the surpluses which were weighing down farm prices. Much of the general improvement in the agricultural situation since then has been made possible because adjustment programs and other measures enabled farmers to reduce these surpluses.

The world carry-over of United States cotton, which was 12,960,000 bales at the beginning of the 1932–33 cotton season, was reduced to 10,634,000 bales at the beginning of the 1934–35 season. By the beginning of the 1935–36 season on August 1, 1935, it had been reduced to approximately 9,000,000 bales.

When the 1934 tobacco-adjustment program started, the total supply of United States tobacco in this country was 3,650,000,000 pounds. A normal supply for the level of consumption then prevailing would have been about 2,900,000,000 pounds. The existing supply thus gave a surplus of some 750,000,000 pounds. By the end of 1935 this surplus had been reduced by about one-third, to around 500,000,000 pounds.

The wheat carry-over on July 1, 1933, was at an all-time high of 393,000,000 bushels. Largely because of the short crop of 1933, the carry-over had, by July 1, 1934, been reduced to 290,000,000 bushels. As of July 1, 1935, it had been reduced to 152,000,000 bushels. Two successive years of short crops, accompanied in 1933 and 1934 by the adjustment programs, have been responsible for reducing the surplus of wheat. The problem now before the American wheat grower is largely that of maintaining such an adjustment that a burdensome surplus will not reappear.

SURPLUSES REMOVED BY GOVERNMENT PURCHASE

In addition to surplus reduction through adjustment programs, surpluses of several farm products have been purchased by the Government and removed from the market in order to support prices for these products. These commodities have for the most part been distributed through relief channels.

A program for removing surplus agricultural products from commercial channels was begun late in 1933. It was coordinated with the drought-relief activities during the drought of 1934. The program included purchases, for relief distribution, of hogs and pork products, dairy products, and sugar. Drought-relief activities included buying and salvaging for relief use of surplus cattle, sheep, and goats which otherwise would have died under the existing drought conditions. Also, feed, forage, and stocks of adapted seed varieties were conserved for sale and distribution to farmers in the drought areas for 1935 seedings.

Including the drought cattle-purchase program and the seed-conservation program, in reality a surplus-removal as well as a drought-relief operation, expenditures by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration in these surplus-removal activities amounted to approximately $204,801,642 at the close of 1935. Of this amount, about $45,623,169 was spent for the removal of surplus hogs and pork products. From this operation were recovered products valued at $24,748,007 that were distributed to relief or sold as grease and tankage. Market value of surplus dairy-products purchases, delivered and distributed to the needy, totaled $22,626,432. Surplus butter delivered was valued at $16,425,059; cheese, at $3,065,878; evaporated milk at $2,223,487; and dry skim milk at $912,008. The market value of domestic beet sugar purchased by the A. A. A., as a surplus-removal and relief-operation value, amounted to $365,536. This does not include approximately 2½ million pounds of Michigan beet sugar already delivered, but for which no vouchers have been received.

THE DROUGHT EMERGENCY

While the reduction in cotton and tobacco carry-overs has been largely due to the adjustment programs, the heavy reduction in wheat, corn, and other grains in 1934, and the reduction in livestock numbers—a necessary accompaniment of the reduction in food grains and pasture—was largely due to the drought.

The first problem in agricultural adjustment was that of surpluses. The second was the drought and the shortages which it brought. The number of cattle on farms when the drought appeared was the highest in more than a decade. The drought cut the supplies of water, feed, and forage supplies far below the needs of these cattle, and producers were forced either to sell their stock without regard to the effect on prices or to let them die of thirst and starvation.

The Government purchased 12,240,262 head of cattle, sheep, and goats at a cost of $119,256,056. Purchases, by States, are shown in table 3.

Because of starvation and thirst, approximately 3,950,000 of these animals were unfit for food purposes and were condemned. The remaining animals were given to the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation for slaughter largely for distribution to those on relief. From them were obtained approximately 766,598,000 pounds of beef and veal of all kinds, 20,741,700 pounds of mutton, and 195,000 pounds of goat meat.

These livestock purchases relieved commercial channels of the pressure by the distressed stock and alleviated the glutting, which would have forced prices still lower. Furthermore, as a result of this measure, farmers whose cattle would otherwise have died on the range had money with which to rebuild their herds on a better basis, many of the inferior animals having been culled out.

When in the early summer of 1934 it became apparent that for the 1935 seedings there would be an acute deficiency of adapted varieties of seed wheat, oats, barley, and flax in the drought areas, the Agricultural Adjustment Administration began a seed-purchase program with a $25,000,000 allocation from emergency funds. Adapted varieties of seed were purchased and prepared for distribution during the 1935 planting season. Expenditures for seed grain, in 20 States and in Canada, as shown in table 4, totaled $16,841,960.63 through December 31, 1935.

Sales were made for cash to farmers who were able to purchase, and seed was transferred to the Federal Emergency Relief Administration to be used in relief.

The livestock and seed purchase programs were only part of the relief brought to the drought-stricken farmers by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. The benefit payments due them under the wheat and corn-hog programs were calculated on production during a previous base period, rather than on the current year's production, and consequently served as a form of crop-income insurance. Rental and benefit payments in the 23 States in the drought area totaled $786,593,652.63 at the close of 1935.

DROUGHT AND CURRENT AGRICULTURAL IMPORTS

The unparalleled drought of 1934 is directly connected with the volume of imports of agricultural commodities into this country in 1934 and 1935. While it is true that at no time since before the depression were our imports of grain, meat, and butter so large as during 1934 and 1935, these imports are insignificant in comparison with the domestic production and consequently in their effect on prices to United States farmers. For the most part they were due to losses caused by the drought rather than to adjustment programs. For example, whereas the estimated 1934 wheat loss from drought amounted to 36 percent of the average 1929–32 annual production, the A. A. A. reduction amounted to only 6.3 percent. On the same basis the corn loss due to drought was approximately 39 percent, the adjustment program accounting for only 7.1-percent reduction.

The proportion borne by the imports of grains, to the total domestic production, even during the drought period, is apparent when combined production of the principal feed and cereal grains—wheat, corn, oats, barley, and rye—measured in tons, is compared with the combined tonnage of imports of the same grains. In the crop year 1934–35 this production was approximately 50,711,461 tons, a drop of 49 percent, or 47,446,071 tons, from the 1928–32 average production.

In the same crop year the imports of these grains totaled about 2,267,837 tons, or 4.4 percent, of the reduced domestic production for the year, 2.3 percent of the average annual production; and only 4.7 percent of the difference between 1934–35 production and the annual average production. The tonnage of imports of these grains in 1934–35 rose from the 5-year average of 506,501 tons to 2,267,837 tons, an increase of 1,761,336 tons. But this increase in imports amounted to only 3.7 percent of the decrease in production.

During the first 6 months of the crop year 1935–36 for which figures are available, imports of grains amounted to approximately 1,185,808 tons and were dropping rapidly as the effect of the increased 1935–36 domestic production was felt. In oats and rye, for example, imports had dropped to zero in January 1936.

SOIL CONSERVATION AND THE A. A. A.

The Soil Conservation Service estimates that approximately 50,000,000 acres of farm land in the United States is already so badly eroded as to be essentially unfit for production of cultivated crops; that another 50,000,000 acres is in almost as bad a condition; that there are now in cultivation 100,000,000 acres of land seriously impaired by erosion, and another 100,000,000 acres on which erosion has begun. Part of this condition has been due to the plowing up of grasslands which should have stayed in sod. Part has been due to the farmers' inability, in the face of distressingly low prices for their products, to take proper care of their farm land. A recent report from the National Resources Committee to the President pointed out that "* * * in another century this great American granary may have become inadequate to support our population if erosion is permitted to continue at the present rate of increase."

The programs of agricultural adjustment, from their launching in the spring of 1933, were concerned with good use of the land of cooperating farmers, as well as with adjustment of the acreage of surplus crops into line with effective demand. The adjustment programs supplemented those of the Soil Conservation Service, the Forest Service, the Resettlement Administration, the State experiment stations, the Agricultural Extension Service, and other agencies, in dealing with the land problem. Farm leaders and administration officials recognized from the start that relieving a proportion of farm land from the soil-exhausting burden of major crop production created an unprecedented opportunity for putting this land to the soil-conserving uses which farm specialists had been advocating for many years.

Provisions were included in contracts offered to more than 3,000,000 cooperating farmers which would insure that the acreage taken out of surplus crops would be put to beneficial uses. The first corn-hog contract, offered for the crop year 1934, authorized use of the rented acreage only "for planting additional permanent pasture, for soil-improving and erosion-preventing crops not to be harvested, for resting or fallowing the land, for weed eradication, or for planting farm wood lots." The first wheat contract, covering the 1933 period, contained similar provisions with respect to the rented acreage. The cotton contract for 1934–35 specified use of the rented acres only for "soil-improving crops, erosion-preventing crops, food crops for consumption by the producer on his farm, feed crops for the production of livestock or livestock products for consumption or use by the producer on his farm, or fallowing, or such other uses as may be permitted by the Secretary of Agriculture or his authorized agent." Food and feed crops for home use were authorized on rented acres in the South, because it was recognized that the standard of farm living in this region, which contains half of the farm population of the country, might thereby be improved. The tobacco contracts carried similar provisions.

In the 1934 crop year, the first in which the adjustment programs were in full swing, farmers agreed to shift their production on nearly 36,000,000 acres. This was an acreage as large as all the acreage harvested in 1931 in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Ohio, and Indiana. It represented 1 out of every 9 acres of cultivated land in the country.

This acreage shifted from intensive major-crop production was distributed through 46 States, as table 5 shows. The largest proportions were in the chief agricultural States, the States where agricultural land is most valuable and most worth conserving. Farmers in Kansas, for example, shifted 2,867,000 acres from corn and wheat; in Iowa, 2,567,000 acres were shifted, mostly from corn; in Nebraska the contracted acreage was 2,253,000; in Illinois, 1,722,000 acres; and so on.

It has been estimated that about one-third of these 36,000,000 shifted acres were put in pasture or meadow crops; approximately another third were used for emergency forage crops and for crops that supplied food and feed for home use; and that the remainder were fallowed, planted to farm wood lots, or left idle. The acreage left idle was very small.

"The most significant change in the use of farm and ranch lands in the United States between 1929 and 1934 was the large increase in the acreage used for pasture or grazing", according to the Bureau of the Census. "In 1934 land in farms and ranches in the United States used for pasture or grazing, other than that from which crops were harvested, amounted to 517,900,401 acres. This was an increase of 53,745,877 acres, or 12 percent, over the 464,154,524 acres reported as pastured or grazed in 1929. This increase was rather general throughout the country with the largest gains in the Southeastern and Gulf coastal areas, in the Great Plains Region, and in the Mountain States. The largest percentage of increase was in the South Atlantic States, with the pasture acreage increasing from 21,794,426 acres to 25,541,975 acres, or a gain of 17 percent. For the most part the increased acreage in pasture represented farm land not suitable for crops and, to a lesser extent, a shift from land formerly used for crops."

FARM BANKRUPTCIES AND BANK FAILURES

After 2 successive years of marked increases, farm bankruptcies declined 20 percent in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, as compared with the preceding year. This decline was a greater relative decline than that for any other occupational group in the country except merchants. The latest data available on farmer bankruptcies are those for the year ended June 30, 1934.

In 1931 banks to the number of 1,705 failed in towns of less than 5,000 population. Another 1,129 failed in 1932. The greater part of the more than 4,000 banks whose position early in 1933 was too weak to enable them to obtain licenses after the moratorium were country banks.

After the bank moratorium, till the end of 1933, figures for the whole country show that while 1,121 of the nonlicensed banks went into liquidation or receivership, only 179 others failed. For the whole year 1934, 927 nonlicensed banks failed, but only 57 licensed banks.

FARM RECOVERY AND INDUSTRIAL PICK-UP

The farmer's increased purchases of city-made goods is making itself felt in the industrial areas of the country.

This has been most clearly evidenced, perhaps, in the case of the automobile industry. Now, automobile registrations in the United States increased from 1,276,524 in 1932 to 1,739,663 in 1933, to 2,292,443 in 1934, and to 3,253,591 in 1935. The increase from 1932 to 1935 was 155 percent.

The relationship between this increased automobile business and increased farm income has been recognized by the automobile industry itself. Automobile Fact and Figures, a publication of the Automobile Manufacturers' Association, points out that the 1934 retail-sales gain was greatest in small towns and on farms, evidenced by the fact that new passenger-car registrations in towns under 10,000 population increased 38 percent over the 1933 figures, where as in cities over 10,000 population the increase amounted to only 18 percent.

The value of sales by large mail-order houses, which do a large proportion of their business with farmers, has shown steady increases. The monthly average sales of these firms were: $38,345,000 in 1932, $39,775,000 in 1933, $49,640,000 in 1934, and $59,878,000 in 1935. The value of sales averaged higher in 1935 than in any period since 1929.

The value of rural retail sales in 1935 for the Nation as a whole, was higher than in any other year since 1929. The 1935 sales value increased 58 percent over that in 1932 and 44 percent in 1933. When compared with 1934, the increase in total sales was largest in the South, which showed a gain of 20 percent. The Far West came next, with a gain of 19.5 percent, while the remaining sections of the country showed an 18-percent gain over 1934.

A study recently made by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration of carlot shipments of industrial products over 4 railroads from 16 industrial States of the Northeast to 10 agricultural States of the Southeast shows that shipments in the year ending July 1, 1934, were 816,302,238 pounds, or 38.8 percent greater than in the preceding 12 months.

Fertilizer tax tag sales, compiled for 17 Southern and Midwestern States only, indicate increased purchases of fertilizer since 1933. During 1933 the equivalent tons purchased in these 17 Southern and Midwestern States totaled 3,342,855. For 1934, purchases aggregated 3,838,875 equivalent tons. For 1935, purchases aggregated 4,317,860 equivalent tons, or an increase of 29 percent over 1933.

According to the American Petroleum Institute, gasoline consumption in the United States increased from 15,436,324,000 gallons in 1933 to 17,632,143,000 gallons in 1935, an increase of 14 percent.

Sales of new ordinary life insurance for the Nation as a whole increased from $5,623,660,000 in 1933 to $6,181,255,000 in 1935, or an increase of 10 percent.

Improved banking conditions are further indications of increased business activity. Monthly statements issued by the Federal Reserve System indicate that debits to individual accounts increased greatly from 1932 to 1935. For 1932 debits in 141 centers throughout the United States totaled $322,365,547,000. By 1934 they had risen to $331,937,074,000, and a preliminary estimate shows that by 1935 debits in these reporting centers stood at $375,423,826,000, or 16 percent above the 1932 figure.

Individual deposits, including both savings and commercial deposits, in banks throughout continental United States aggregated $41,720,194,000, an advance of $6,173,787,000, or 17 percent for the year ending June 29, 1935, in comparison with the year closing June 30, 1933. These figures are based on reports received by the savings division of the American Bankers Association.

The number of all commercial failures dropped steadily and rapidly from 1932 through 1935. From a high of 31,822 in 1932 such failures declined to 20,307 in 1933, to 12,185 in 1934, and to 11,879 in 1935. Commercial failures in 1935 therefore amounted to only 37 percent of those in 1932.

Other indexes show further improvement. Estimates by the Bureau of Labor Statistics indicate that expenditures for building operations in 257 identical cities aggregated $382,389,451 in 1933, compared with $655,213,410 in 1935. This represents an increase of 71 percent.

Employment and pay rolls in manufacturing industries are also on the upturn. The average number of persons employed in these industries jumped from a low of 5,374,000 in 1932 to 6,891,000 in 1935, thereby increasing 28 percent. During the same period the average weekly pay roll of these industries rose from $93,757,000 to $142,990,000, or 53 percent.

Further indications of general recovery, as influenced in part by the adjustment programs and other recovery measures, are shown in table 7.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas does not quite agree with some of the strictures which some of his colleagues seem to have passed upon the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. I greatly sympathize with the Senator from Michigan, because I realize that he is engaged in seeking after truth and information. I admire the man who is always struggling for more information, more enlightenment, more knowledge regarding great public questions.

I remember when as a young boy I first knocked at the door of the public school. I did not do it voluntarily. I did it because my father and mother, with rather great insistence and threat of a hickory switch, urged that I attend—and I attended. But the man who has an innate and overwhelming passion for knowledge and information is the man I admire, and that is why I desire to second in every way I can the efforts of the Senator from Michigan. I do not mean the idle curiosity of the gossip who merely wants to mull over the sordid and venal details of some neighborhood story; I do not mean the manifestations of interest which sometimes actuate a senatorial committee in boring into the seemingly private affairs of individuals; nor do I refer to the rabid desire of some newspaper correspondents to publish all the horrible details of crime and other events. But here is the Senator from Michigan in a sincere search for the truth. He wants to know about the big farmers. He is not concerned with the little farmer. He is for the little farmer. There are a great many more little farmers than there are big farmers, so the Senator from Michigan is perfectly willing to vote out of the Treasury generous amounts for the small farmer; but the big farmer is the object of his wrath.

Mr. President, I am surprised that the Senator from Michigan did not have the statesmanship and the foresight to realize, when the A. A. A. bill was pending, that the big farmers were going to get something out of that measure. I wonder why he did not offer an amendment graduating the rates as he now proposes. If he had done that and we had adopted the amendment, these horrible things would not have occurred, and the country would not have been shocked at the prospect of a farmer somewhere getting more than $10,000 in benefits.

But we have now no bill before us for consideration. The A. A. A. is a thing of the past. It has gone down before the decision of the Supreme Court. We have passed another agricultural-relief bill, but I have no recollection that the Senator from Michigan offered any amendment to the soil-conservation bill. Why did he not advance at that time the suggestion he has made today? Other Senators did not have the initiative, we did not have the foresight, we did not happen to think about it, but the Senator from Michigan sat here in the Senate with that secret wrapped up in his bosom and refused to let us know anything about it.

As a matter of fact, let us see how the Senator's plan would have worked if we had adopted it. He would have denied the large farmer anything except a very small benefit for reducing his production. The result would have been that the large farmers would not have reduced; they would not have come into the program, while the small farmers would have come in, and the result would have been that the large farmers, like all large concerns do, would soon have monopolized agriculture, and the little farmer, about whose interests the Senator is so greatly concerned, in large measure would have disappeared from the picture because the field would have been occupied by the large farmer.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator knows, of course, as we all do, that wherever and whenever the farmer has tried to organize without any encouragement on the part of the Government, the organizations have frequently and usually broken down because of the willingness of a few to stay on the outside and do as they please and reap the rewards of those who cooperated in order that they might benefit the condition of all. If the large farmers to whom the Senator from Michigan has referred, who are now being discussed by the Senator from Texas, by reason of the smallness of their proportionate reward for any curtailment had remained out, the story of agriculture in this country in the last 3 years would have been quite different from what it is.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course. Selfishness operates on farmers just as it does on Senators. Therefore, naturally, the big farmer is going to do that which he thinks is to his advantage or to his interest. Had he been excluded from the benefits of the measure he would have gone out and gotten all the benefits he could outside of the program and to that extent would have destroyed or lessened the effectiveness of the Government's program.

Why is it, I ask the Senator from Michigan, when for the first time in the history of the Government Congress has really done something to aid agriculture, when for the first time since the War between the States political parties have kept their promises to give agriculture somewhat of an even break with industry, that that is made the occasion for the assault by the Senator from Michigan?

Not only was the Senator from Michigan opposed to the A. A. A. bill, but now that it is buried and the green grass is growing over its grave, the spirit and spleen of the Senator from Michigan are not content, but he must desecrate its grave and heap odium upon that which he fears did something substantial for agriculture.

Mr. President, I have offered an amendment to the pending resolution. I hope it may be adopted. It is brief. It calls for information. It emulates the example of the Senator from Michigan in seeking information. The amendment asks the Tariff Commission, and it already has the information I am sure, to advise the Senate the names and gross business of three—I am not asking for all of them, but only of three—corporations in those respective fields which did the largest gross business in 1924. The first one is aluminum. Why is not the Senator from Michigan concerned with the great profits made by the Aluminum Trust under the sheltering protection of the Government of the United States? Where did its inordinate profits come from except that it sells here in a highly protected market with palisades erected by law lifted up to keep out any foreign competitor?

The former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, under the administration of the party to which the Senator from Michigan belongs, reaped untold millions of profit from the aluminum industry, protected as perhaps no other industry in America is protected. Is there any inquiry here, or was there ever any inquiry at any time by the Senator from Michigan, asking the Treasury Department to tell us why Mr. Mellon gets his millions from the tariff-protected aluminum industry? But while perfectly willing for that sort of thing to go on, the Senator from Michigan is aroused, his spirit is in turmoil, because somewhere, somehow, some farmer, for the first time in history, was able to obtain from the Congress his first tariff benefit by reason of the A. A. A.

In the next classification, I ask about the steel industry. I should like to have the American people know, because the Senator from Michigan already knows—this is not for his information, but it is for the information of the American people—why it is that he is so content for the Steel Trust to reap millions upon millions of dollars from these same farmers. Every time the farmer sticks his plow in the ground he pays tribute to the Steel Trust. Every morning, when he unhooks his old hoe from the rack and goes out under the burning sun, amid the cockleburs and the crabgrass, to struggle with the cotton or with the corn, he must first pay tribute to the masters of steel who are taking down, by reason of the force of law of the United States, untold millions in profits. Yet the Senator from Michigan looks upon that exploitation of the steel master with complacency, and turns his gaze from the steel master, with his untold millions, to the poor, sweating farmer, and says, "Get a detective; go down and see if the farmer has not got a few dollars left in his jeans."

It reminds me of the effort of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] when a few poor farmers were able to thumb their way to Washington last year, or to get up here in some way, to thank the administration for the enactment of the A. A. A. bill. Before they got out of town, the Senator from Delaware, actuated by the same kind of motive that moves the Senator from Michigan, submitted a resolution of investigation to see how the farmers got to Washington, who paid their way, and how they came to be here. He assumed, of course, that none of them had enough money to pay their own way, and under normal conditions they would not have had enough money.

I desire to know how much money the Bethlehem Steel Co. gets through the protective tariff when it cannot only pay its president, Mr. Eugene Grace, $100,000 in salary but in a single year paid to him a bonus of $1,650,000. Under the administration of Mr. Hoover, under the administration of the party to which the Senator from Michigan belongs, under the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, for which the Senator voted, if he was here, Mr. Grace, of the Bethlehem Steel Co., was able to filch from the treasury of that concern $1,650,000 as a bonus for a single year's work.

Oh, but that is all right. The Senator from Michigan, by his silence, says it is all right. We heard no outcry from the Senator from Michigan; we heard no resolution from the Senator from Michigan inquiring where that $1,650,000 came from—no inquiry, no interest, no care, no concern—but if a farmer, out of the sweat and the blood of his toil, gets a little handful of money, the Senator from Michigan wishes to ferret it out. He wishes to placard it before the world: "Look at this profiteer. Look at this highwayman, this farmer, who, for the first time in his life, got any of the advantages of government."

Who paid the $1,650,000 to Mr. Grace, of the Steel Trust? It was the farmer who paid for it, in the tires on his wagons, in the steel in his plows and in his hoes, and in all the implements that go to enable him by his toil to produce from the earth the things that feed the world.

Mr. President, when the Democrats came into power in 1933 the farmer stood pauperized in the presence of his own growing crops that fed a hungry world.

Yet because this party and this administration had the courage and the practical ability to frame a measure that did something for agriculture—it did not do much—we are presented with the spectacle of the Senator from Michigan, who in all probability will lead the hosts of his party next November if he is willing to serve, taking the public attitude of condemning the administration of the A. A. A. Act, thereby condemning the act itself. Let it go out from this Chamber today that the Senator from Michigan is not only opposed to the Agricultural Adjustment Act but he is opposed to the way in which it is administered on a basis of equality, on a basis of equity, on a basis of impartiality, to give to the large farmers, though few there be, the same measure of justice that is given to the small farmers.

I wonder if the Senator from Michigan will subscribe to any other doctrine than that. Does the Senator from Michigan believe that because one man has 200 acres of land, he ought to be treated differently from another man who has 100 acres of land? If the Senator does, he has introduced into this Chamber a new philosophy and a new political theory.

If Senators wish to reach the larger farmer, let them reach him by taxation. I am one who does not believe in the accumulation of great masses of land in the hands of one individual or in the hands of a corporation; but the way to distribute ownership is through taxation, or through a comprehensive land program to break up large holdings. When it comes to the administration of law, however, if all men are not equal under the law, we remove one of the best and one of the most treasured and one of the most sacred American traditions. When one man who stands before the bar of justice or before a Government department is to be treated in one way and another man is to be treated in another way, the very safeguards of our institutions are to be broken down.

Mr. President, in conclusion I ask for some other information. I wish to know about photographic cameras and films. I wish to know about chemicals and dyes. The chemical industry of America has received tremendous help from the Government. Great tariff favoritism has been shown to it. I desire the Tariff Commission to tell us about that while the Agricultural Department is telling us about some poor little one-horse farmer who, for the first time in his life, got a little taste of the things upon which these great masters and captains have fattened for more than half a century; and because he likes it, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] are outraged. I desire to know about electric appliances and equipment, and cellophane and rayon. I should like to know something about plate glass, which has its headquarters yonder in Pittsburgh, and which has reaped millions upon millions of profits from the people of America. I should like to know about cast-iron pipe and fittings, and articles manufactured of tin.

This information is available. While the Senator from Michigan is searching out information about the farmers, let us get also some information on the other side of the books. While we are getting a picture of the farmer's profits and his benefits, it is fair, I think, to get something on the other side of the ledger, as to his burdens and his obligations.

How can the Budget be properly balanced unless the credits and the debits are shown? The Senator from Michigan wants to show all of the debits, he wants to show how the farmer is rolling in luxury. I want to show some of the profits which are made from his bending back and his aching body, along with the tremendous benefits which the Senator from Michigan points out.

Mr. President, I hope my amendment to the resolution may be adopted. I have no objection to the resolution. I do not believe that the operations of government ought to be secret. I believe in the fullest publicity of all things with respect to the relation of the Government to the citizen.

I have no objection to the Secretary of Agriculture giving the Senator from Michigan the information he seeks, but while we are on the hunt for that information, let us get something on the other side of the ledger which may in some degree justify the small pittance which the Government provided for the farmer through the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which was later declared to be unconstitutional.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I have sent to the desk an amendment which I proposed to add to the resolution as it is now drafted:

The amendment I propose reads as follows:

Provided further, That on the basis of the data submitted, the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry shall report to the Senate the degree to which land ownership had by 1933 become concentrated in large corporate holdings with such recommendations as the committee may see fit to make to Congress.

My reason for proposing this addition to the resolution should be clear to all.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] must have back of his resolution some idea besides merely a desire for publicity on payments.

In effect, the Senator deplores the large payments that have been made by the A. A. A., yet he has found no fault whatever with the manner in which the big payments were made. He has disavowed entirely any implication that there was any irreguarity in making the big payments. What, then, is the real essence of the criticism which the Senator is making? I have been thinking about that and have been trying to arrive at the really fundamental thought back of his resolution.

I have reached the conclusion which I believe everyone must reach who studies the matter closely. This conclusion is that the real criticism of the Senator from Michigan is against the alarming growth of corporation farming in this country. This must be what he is really driving at, because he cannot very well offer any criticism of a uniform system of making payments.

The fact is that paying small and large farmers the same per unit of land or production resulted in enormous sums going to a few big corporations. If that idea, that criticism, is the heart of the Vandenberg resolution, then I am 100 percent for doing something about it.

I think the Senate ought to study deeply into the reasons for the trend toward corporation farming on the Continent and in the islands. This used to be a nation of small landowners—a nation of farmers whose farms were their homes. If the present trend keeps up it will become a nation in which the agricultural resources of the Nation will be in the hands of land barons and corporation farmers.

The trend toward concentration of land ownership was running strong through the decade from 1920 to 1930.

The number of farms in this country operated by tenants increased over 200,000, or 8.5 percent during those years, as shown by the following figures:

Number of farms operated by tenants

1920	2,454,804
1925	2,462,608
1930	2,664,365

This shows a step-up of 8.5 percent in a decade.

But while the tenant-operated farms were increasing so rapidly in number, the total number of all farms was decreasing 2.5 percent.

All land in farms increased 3.2 percent during this decade, while land operated by tenants increased 15.6 percent.

Of all farm operators in 1920 tenants operated 38.1 percent.

Of all farm operators in 1925 tenants operated 38.6 percent.

Of all farm operators in 1930 tenants operated 42.4 percent.

After the depression hit agriculture mortgage holders began gobbling up farms right and left through foreclosure. That was what Secretary Wallace meant when he pointed out that the collapse of farm prices in 1932 forced great numbers of farmers to lose their lands, and that if this trend toward centralized land ownership was to be stopped, something had to be done toward raising farm prices high enough above the ruinous levels of 1932 so that farmers could make enough money to keep their farms.

The number of farm bankruptcies increased from 4,464 in the fiscal year 1930 to 5,917, or more than 30 percent, in 1933. This was the way small farmers lost their farms in the depression.

The number of forced farm sales increased from 19.5 per thousand in the year ending March 15, 1929, to 54.1 per thousand in the year ending March 15, 1933.

The collapse of farm prices in that period placed the farmers at the mercy of the bankers and the mortgage holders, as the figures show. If the depression had gone on for a few more years probably most of the small farms of the country would have been sold at forced sales and thousands of them would have passed into some form or another of corporate ownership.

After the Roosevelt administration got into action with farm and other recovery programs the trend toward concentration of farm-land ownership was stopped.

The number of farm bankruptcy cases concluded decreased from 5,917 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, to 4,716 for the year ending June 30, 1934. This was a decline of more than 20 percent.

The number of forced farm sales dropped from 54.1 per thousand for the year ending March 15, 1933, to 28.3 per thousand for the year ending March 15, 1935.

This great decline—of almost 50 percent—in the number of forced farm sales shows the tremendous service of the A. A. A. and the Roosevelt administration in protecting small farmers who had been losing their farms at a great rate in the Hoover depression.

Still it is true that while the riot of farm foreclosures was stopped there are in existence now great corporations holding sway over vast areas of farm lands.

The lands held by these corporations are not operated by independent farmers owning and tilling their own lands, living in their own homesteads. Instead, the great feudal estates of these corporation farms are often operated by wage hands having no interest in the land and often receiving only meager wages.

Secretary Wallace's letter to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] about the large payments to sugar corporations show how the A. A. A. contracts were made to contain provisions for definite scales of wages, working hours, and prohibition of child labor. This was necessary so that the wage hands would share in the Government's payments, and one of the biggest Puerto Rican corporations refused to sign such a contract.

I agree with Secretary Wallace that the great problem is not the size of these payments but the social and economic implications about the degree of concentration of land ownership which they show has taken place in this country.

I hope the Senator from Michigan agrees with me that something needs to be done to break up these great land holdings.

I have been able to follow his resolution, and everybody—Secretary Wallace, and I assume that most of us in the Senate agree that the names of the recipients of big payments may be published. There does not appear to be the slightest disagreement about that.

That is not the real point in the resolution; the real point is the existence in some farming industries and the prevalence in others—as, for example, the sugar industry of Hawaii, which is entirely in the hands of 39 corporations—of great farming corporations.

In view of the real meaning of the Senator's resolution, I have been at a loss to understand his votes on some of the agricultural issues raised in this body, to which full reference has been made by the Senator from Arkansas.

I agree that the Jones-Costigan Act was primarily for the little sugar farmers of Michigan and Colorado and Louisiana and Puerto Rico.

I agree that it was necessary, in order to help little producers, to have an act that would bring about an adjustment of production and a disappearance of surpluses, so that prices would rise and farmers would be able to hold their farms. I agree that no adjustment in production would have been possible if the big sugar corporations had been left out—had been free to expand production and put the whole burden of low prices on the little fellows.

But why oppose the A. A. A. and the A. A. A. amendments and then vote for the Jones-Costigan Sugar Act? The big corporation payments are concentrated in the sugar program.

I do not follow the logic of the able Senator from Michigan. I think the logic of his resolution is clearer than the logic of his votes. I think the logic of his resolution leads to the conclusion that steps should be taken to break up the corporation farms. I wonder if the Senator from Michigan will stand with me and others in a fight to do something about that?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in the speech President Roosevelt made in New York Saturday night he outlined his philosophy, which I learn from the clipping I have in my hand is that of—

> Higher wages for workers, more income for farmers, more goods produced, more and better food eaten, fewer unemployed, and lower taxes.
> That is my economic and social philosophy and, incidentally, my political philosophy as well—

The President said in closing his speech.

As I see it, the surest way to lower taxes is to make the people tax-conscious. I can think of no one thing that would make a large group of citizens of the United States more tax-conscious—no other one thing, certainly—than the publication of the bounties received from plowing under crops and reducing production on the farms.

I did not think it was quite fair of Senators on our side of the aisle to make the references they did to what to me was the perfectly plain position of the Senator from Michigan. I did not see, in what he was doing, any bid for political popularity. Perhaps there would be a great bid for political popularity if he proposed at some time more bounties for more persons.

There is a great distinction in my mind between publicity of bounties given by the Triple A and the publicity given to income received by business concerns or by private individuals. The two forms of publicity are not the same. If we were to put the farm income on the same plane as the income of manufacturers and private individuals, then we should ask for the publicity of farm returns. How much did the farmer receive from the operation of his farm? But that we are not doing.

In the resolution it is proposed that the country shall know how much was given to reduce crops and to whom the money was paid. I myself prepared a resolution on the subject, and I was not so modest as was the Senator from Michigan. Two months ago I prepared a resolution asking that in the case of everyone who had been given $500 or more in the way of an A. A. A. bounty publicity should be given to the amount received.

Why should we not know about these things? I think we should let everyone know what money has been handed out for the reduction of crops, and so on.

I stood here in bitter opposition to the publication of income-tax returns. I gave reasons why I thought it was a bad thing that publicity should be given—that it makes every person whose income is publicized the target for kidnapers and blackmailers and extortionists and robbers. That is an entirely different thing from the little revenue received by a few farmers through the bounty of the Government and which has no relationship to the normal earnings of the recipients.

Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from Michigan that he stood up under the barrage he received. He does not need any sympathy. He carries himself well.

For my part, I am in 100-percent agreement with the thought that there should be the widest possible publicity of the bounties given out in accordance with the Triple A project and any other bounties which are distributed. We have not hesitated to tell how much money the ship operators have had. The widest possible publicity has been given to that. Why should not the same publicity be given to the men who have had bounties from another department of Government?

Of course, for myself, while I voted for the A. A. A., I was never content with the effect of its application. I am glad to say I did not vote for the Costigan sugar bill. I did not do so because I thought it was an outrageous invasion of the welfare of the people of Puerto Rico. I feel the same way about the quota placed upon the tobacco production of that island. I should like to say, in passing, that I cannot understand the philosophy of suddenly throwing into the Senate the idea of turning the Puerto Ricans loose upon the world. I had no part in passing the Costigan Act.

I do protest, with all the seriousness I possess, against the publication of the incomes of those who are engaged in industry in this country, and of the incomes of private individuals as well. But if we are to do that at all, let us have everybody, including the farmer, share in the publicity. However, when it comes to the bounties which are given by the lavish hand of the Government, let us know to whom we give the money, and in every instance how much has been the contribution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACHMAN in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Arkansas if he desires to go further tonight in the consideration of the measure?

Mr. ROBINSON. I thought we might dispose of the pending resolution. Let us dispose of it.

Mr. McNARY. Other amendments to it will be offered. I shall have to suggest the absence of a quorum at this point, unless we may have an understanding that we shall recess at this hour or take up the proposal of the Senator from Georgia, which is now the temporary unfinished business.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not understand that there is to be further debate on the pending resolution.

Mr. McNARY. Very well. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in justice to the Secretary of Agriculture I ask that the clerk may read the letter which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina submits a letter, which the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., April 15, 1936.

Hon. ELLISON D. SMITH,
Chairman, Committee on Agriculture and Forestry,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR SMITH: When Senate Resolution 265 comes up for consideration I hope you will make clear to the Senate that the Department of Agriculture stands ready to supply any information whatever the Senate wants to ask for as to benefit and rental payments under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. We do not wish to be misunderstood as asking for any limitations on the publication of information about A. A. A. payments.

The question as to the form the resolution takes is wholly one of the time that the Senate wishes the Agricultural Adjustment Administration to devote to compilation of the information concerned.

Information as to payments over $10,000 or over $1,000 under each adjustment program in any contract year could be obtained with the least time, and with little or no risk of delaying payments to farmers either under the new soil-conservation program or the old adjustment programs.

Since the information on payments is filed separately for each commodity program, and since there are about 6,900,000 contracts in all, to cross-check all contracts in different commodity programs so as to segregate and report on totals of individuals' payments in more than one program would be a compiling task of great magnitude, requiring several months at least.

Nevertheless I wish to make clear the Department's complete willingness to report any information on payments that the Senate may ask for.

Sincerely yours,

H. A. WALLACE, Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may we have the amendments stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 2, after the word "Senate", it is proposed to strike out the words "forthwith the name and address and the amount paid to each producer exceeding $10,000 in each calendar year" and insert "as soon as practicable the name, county, and State (including Puerto Rico and Hawaii), and the amount paid to each producer, in the sum of $10,000 or more, for each contract year, together with commodity, acreage, or number of livestock involved for which payment was made"; and at the end of the resolution to add a proviso, so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate as soon as practicable the name, county, and State (including Puerto Rico and Hawaii) and the amount paid to each producer in the sum of $10,000 or more for each contract year, together with commodity, acreage, or number of livestock involved for which payment was made pursuant to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended: Provided, That the total amount paid for each basic commodity for each State or Territory or possession be given for each contract year and the total number receiving such payments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I believe those are the only committee amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that those are the only committee amendments.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then I offer now the amendment which I had read earlier in the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the resolution it is proposed to add the following:

Provided, That the United States Tariff Commission shall, and is hereby directed to, report to the Senate within 60 days the names and addresses of manufacturing corporations in the United States having statutory net incomes in 1934 of $1,000,000 or more, producing commodities protected by the tariff, the rates of duty on principal commodities produced by each, and the 1934 selling prices derived from general sources of such commodities: And provided further, That the Commission shall, and is hereby directed to, supplement this report as soon as the information can be compiled, but with the time for compilation not limited to 60 days, similar information as to corporations, commodities, rates, and prices for the year 1935, together with the Commission's estimates of the following: (1) The effect of the tariff on selling prices of such commodities; (2) the effect of the tariff on the statutory net incomes of these corporations; (3) the effect of such rates of duty on consumer expenditures for such commodities as compared with revenue derived by the United States Treasury therefrom.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the resolution it is proposed to insert the following:

Resolved further, That the United States Tariff Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate forthwith the names and addresses and the gross volume of sales of the three corporations or factories (naming them separately for each article or group listed below) which did the largest gross business during the calendar year 1934 in the production and manufacturing of the following tariff-protective articles and commodities: (1) Aluminum; (2) steel and iron; (3) photo cameras and films; (4) chemicals and dyes; (5) electric appliances and equipment; (6) cellophane and rayon; (7) plate glass; (8) cast-iron pipe and fittings; (9) articles or wares manufactured of tin.

Such Commission is also requested to furnish the tariff rates or schedules then in effect as to each of such listed commodities or articles.

Such Commission is also requested to furnish the total amount in dollars of benefits or protection each of such corporations received during such year, assuming that the tariff was fully effective. Such Commission is also requested (if it would not delay the filing of such report) to give its estimate as to the percentage of effectiveness of such tariff rates for such year as to each of such articles or commodities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have not previously heard the amendment read. Is it the idea that the Department shall remain silent and dumb until these facts are all discovered? Will the amendment deter the Secretary of Agriculture from making a report on the body of the resolution?

Mr. CONNALLY. It will not interfere with the Department of Agriculture acting at once. This inquiry is addressed to the Tariff Commission, which will reply when it secures the information.

Mr. McNARY. Then it is not the purpose of the Senator to delay unnecessarily a report from the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. CONNALLY. It is not. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that I am perfectly agreeable to the resolution of the Senator from Michigan. Let us have this information. I am so hungry for information that I desire more than the Senator from Michigan desires.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I wish to join the Senator from Texas in expressing the hope that his amendment will be adopted, and that his hunger for information will not be appeased when some additional amendments shall be offered later from this side of the aisle.

Mr. CONNALLY. I should like to see them when they come from that side of the aisle. [Laughter.] I always like to look them over very carefully before I agree to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry. Have all the amendments heretofore proposed been read and adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] presented an amendment which has not been acted upon.

Mr. BARBOUR. I shall be very glad to have the amendment of the Senator from Washington supersede mine.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I will say that my colleague [Mr. BONE] is on his way to the Senate Chamber from his office and will reach here very shortly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, let me offer the amendment on behalf of the Senator from Washington, because I am cordially in concurrence with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan will present the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I assume that it is at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan on behalf of the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of the resolution the following:

Provided further, That, on the basis of the data submitted, the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry shall report to the Senate the degree to which land ownership had by 1933 become concentrated in large corporate holdings, with such recommendations as the committee may see fit to make to Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] on behalf of the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I now ask to have stated the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the resolution it is proposed to insert the following paragraph:

Resolved further, That the Resettlement Administration is requested to report to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date: (1) The nature and extent of all expenditures made or proposed to be made by such Administration; (2) the nature and extent of projects undertaken by it, and the advisability of undertaking future projects; (3) the effect of each such project on State and local taxation and on local real-estate values; (4) the extent to which such projects have benefited and will benefit labor; and (5) the circumstances relating to the securing of persons as tenants or purchasers in connection with such projects, and the effect on such persons of becoming such tenants or purchasers.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I move to lay on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I understand that motion is not debatable. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to lay on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR]. On that question the yeas and nays have been requested.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. METCALF (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. As he is not present, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CONNALLY (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote, since I have a pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who, if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. CAREY (after having voted in the negative). I find that I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], and will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. BARKLEY (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. BILBO. I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] are detained from the Senate on account of illness.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is detained on account of illness in his family.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN] are members of the Committee to Visit the Naval Academy, and therefore are necessarily detained.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senators from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY and Mr. DONAHEY], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senators from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS and Mr. DIETERICH], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MOORE], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], the Senators from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS and Mr. RADCLIFFE], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] are unavoidably detained.

Mr. McNARY. I announce that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is absent because of his duty as a member of the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy.

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—32

Costigan	Holt	Pittman

So Mr. BARBOUR's amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, to the resolution I expect to offer an amendment to which I do not believe there will be any objection on the other side. This amendment is identical with one offered by the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] during the second session of the Seventy-second Congress, and the RECORD shows that the resolution was agreed to unanimously, with very little debate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the difficulty with the manner in which we are proceeding now is that no one is familiar with the amendments which are being presented except the Senators offering them. There has been no opportunity to study them, no opportunity to know what is proposed. It was my thought that the resolution should be confined to the subject matter believed to be germane to the original provisions of the resolution although I know there is no rule of the Senate which so limits our action. The debate has developed the fact that there is a disposition to present a great many amendments, so I should like to have an opportunity to see the amendment the Senator is about to offer, and other Senators would like to see it, or have it read.

Mr. CAREY. I shall be very glad to have the clerk read the amendment, but I should like to hold the floor and make some remarks after the amendment shall have been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to add at the proper place the following:

Provided further, That the Civil Service Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with a full and complete list of all offices, positions, places, and employments, listing the same by departments, bureaus, boards, commissions, and independent establishments, including the government of the District of Columbia, unofficial observers, special attorneys, or special agents, and Federal employments of all kinds, with the amount of salaries of each attached, under the Government of the United States and not under civil-service rules and regulations.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CAREY. I cannot yield now. I will take but a moment.

As I have stated, this amendment is identical in wording with a resolution offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] on January 3, 1933, and in offering the resolution the Senator from Tennessee made the following statement:

Mr. President, I want to make just a brief statement about the proposed resolution. In 1921 a similar resolution was offered and unanimously adopted, as I recall, having looked the matter up a short time ago, and the information was furnished by the Civil Service Commission. The Civil Service Commission probably is doing some of the work already which would result from the adoption of this resolution, at the request of the Senate, expecting the resolution to be passed. I hope there will be no objection to it.

I find that later the Senator from Tennessee stated:

It may not be an official notice, but it will be information open to all, to Democrats as well as Republicans. I recall very distinctly that in 1921 a similar resolution was offered, and it was agreed to without objection.

I also wish to quote from the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who said on that occasion:

Mr. President, I understand the Civil Service Commission has the whole list prepared, so there cannot be any expense attached to the resolution, and it does not seem to me there ought to be any objection to it.

Mr. President, I wish to say that if the information was necessary at that time, it is just as necessary now. In fact, some 250,000 more employees would come under this classification than there were at that time.

As for the amendment not being germane, I submit that it is as germane to the original resolution as were the amendments accepted on the other side this afternoon. I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this amendment relates to a subject wholly unconnected with the subject matter of the resolution now under consideration, and I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. VANDENBERG and Mr. MCNARY asked for the yeas and nays; the yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BARKLEY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], which I transfer to the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and vote "yea."

Mr. BILBO (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], which I transfer to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN], and vote "yea."

Mr. CAREY (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. METCALF (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. The Senator from Maryland not being present, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LOGAN. On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. That Senator not being present, I am obliged to withdraw my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] are detained from the Senate on account of illness.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is detained on account of illness in his family.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN] are members of the Committee to Visit the Naval Academy and, therefore, are necessarily detained.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senators from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY and Mr. DONAHEY], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senators from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS and Mr. DIETERICH], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MOORE], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], the Senators from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS and Mr. RADCLIFFE], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN], the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] are unavoidably detained.

Mr. MCNARY. I announce that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is necessarily absent on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—41

Adams	Chavez	McAdoo	Sheppard
Bailey	Connally	Maloney	Smith
Barkley	Duffy	Minton	Thomas, Okla.

So Mr. CAREY's amendment was laid on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate as soon as practicable the name, county, and State (including Puerto Rico and Hawaii), and the amount paid to each producer, in the sum of $10,000 or more, for each contract year, together with commodity, acreage, or number of livestock involved for which payment was made, pursuant to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended: Provided, That the total amount paid for each basic commodity for each State or Territory or possession be given for each contract year and the total number receiving such payments: Provided further, That on the basis of the data submitted, the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry shall report to the Senate the degree to which land ownership had by 1933 become concentrated in large corporate holdings, with such recommendations as the committee may see fit to make to Congress.

Resolved further, That the United States Tariff Commission shall and is hereby directed to report to the Senate within 60 days the names and addresses of manufacturing corporations in the United States having statutory net incomes in 1934 of $1,000,000 or more, producing commodities protected by the tariff, the rates of duty on principal commodities produced by each, and the 1934 selling prices derived from general sources of such commodities and; Provided further, That the Commission shall and is hereby directed to supplement this report as soon as the information can be compiled, but with the time for compilation not limited to 60 days, similar information as to corporations, commodities, rates, and prices for the year 1935, together with the Commission's estimates of the following: (1) The effect of the tariff on selling prices of such commodities; (2) the effect of the tariff on the statutory net incomes of these corporations; (3) the effect of such rates of duty on consumer expenditures for such commodities as compared with revenue derived by the United States Treasury therefrom:

Resolved further, That the United States Tariff Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate forthwith the names and addresses and the gross volume of sales of the three corporations or factories (naming them separately for each article or group listed below) which did the largest gross business during the calendar year 1934, in the production and manufacturing of the following tariff-protected articles and commodities: (1) Aluminum; (2) steel and iron; (3) photo cameras and films; (4) chemicals and dyes; (5) electric appliances and equipment; (6) cellophane and rayon; (7) plate glass; (8) cast-iron pipe and fittings; (9) articles or wares manufactured of tin.

Such Commission is also requested to furnish the tariff rates or schedules then in effect as to each such listed commodities or articles.

Such Commission is also requested to furnish the total amount in dollars of benefits or protection each of such corporations received during such year, assuming that the tariff was fully effective.

Such Commission is also requested (if it would not delay the filing of such report) to give its estimate as to the percentage of effectiveness of such tariff rates for such year as to each of such articles or commodities.

MONDAY, APRIL 27, 1936

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and everlasting God, give ear to our supplication and answer us in Thy righteousness and faithfulness; incline our hearts to seek Thee and to revere Thy word. Look through our limitations with the light of Thy sovereign wisdom and command our understanding. O Maker and Ruler of all, before whose infinite greatness we worship, we thank Thee most humbly for splendid visions, for wondrous prospects, and for mighty hopes. We entreat Thee to make Thyself more real in our lives, full of meaning and power. Inspire us to be brave with exemplary conduct that constitutes a telling influence amid the shadows of our day. Bless our President, our Speaker, and every Member of the Congress; as lovers of the truth, we pray that our patriotism and aspirations may glow with incense kindled at the feet of the Master. In His name. Amen.

RURAL-ELECTRIFICATION ACTIVITY IN WISCONSIN

Mr. SCHNEIDER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on rural electrification and include therein a letter from the State board of rural electrification.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHNEIDER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I desire to include a report made by Hon. Orland S. Loomis, director of the State of Wisconsin rural electrification coordination, to the National Emergency Council on April 20, 1936. This report reviews the activities of Director Loomis and his associates and the committee representing farm and cooperative organizations to help Wisconsin farmers get electric-power service for their farms.

This report is of a special interest now in view of the fact that Congress has just approved legislation continuing the rural-electrification program for a 10-year period. Hon. Morris L. Cooke, Director of the Rural Electrification Administration, and the present staff will continue to handle the administration of the act and granting of loans through the central office in Washington.

I want to direct particular attention to the statement by Director Loomis that private power companies have constructed practically no power lines to farmers in the past 5 years. He also shows that a minimum guarantee of $15 per month for 3 years has been required in Jefferson County, and even then many farms were refused service. Now the company is willing to serve all farmers, including those previously refused service, for a payment of only $4 per month. Farmers in many communities have had similar experiences.

REPORT OF ORLAND S. LOOMIS, STATE DIRECTOR OF RURAL ELECTRIFICATION COORDINATION, TO THE NATIONAL EMERGENCY COUNCIL, APRIL 20, 1936

The Rural Electrification Administration, known as R. E. A., was created by an Executive order of President Roosevelt on May 11, 1935, as an independent agency to initiate, formulate, administer, and supervise a program of projects designed to promote the generation, transmission, and distribution of electric energy in the rural areas of the United States.

Although the Rural Electrification Administration itself has no regional or State offices, coordinating offices and agencies have been set up in many States. Realizing that the farmers of Wisconsin were desirous of taking advantage of the benefits and good purposes which the R. E. A. had to offer, Governor La Follette, in October 1935, created the office of rural electrification coordination in this State, to the end that Wisconsin might obtain for this State its proportionate share of the $100,000,000 allotted for rural-electrification work in this country. The work of this office is that of a coordinating agency. It acts as a liaison between the farmers in this State and the R. E. A. at Washington. During the entire period of its existence the closest of cooperation has existed between this office and that of the R. E. A. at Washington.

The policies of the office are established and guided by representatives of all the educational farm organizations in the State, including the consumer and marketing cooperatives, to wit: Farmers' Equity Union, Wisconsin Farm Bureau Federation, Wisconsin Cooperative Milk Pool, Progressive Farmers of Wisconsin, Wisconsin State Grange, Wisconsin Farm Holiday Association, Cooperative League of Wisconsin, and Northern States Cooperative League. The work is carried out in accordance with such established policies by the undersigned as director.

Wisconsin has much need for rural electrification, because only 20 percent of the farms of this State are now electrified. By reason of the fact that it is a dairy State, it has more needs for the use of electricity than almost any other State in this country. Every effort, therefore, is being made by this office to assist the farmers of this State in obtaining electric service and to thus promote the work of economic recovery in this State.

This office has been furnished quarters at 213 SE in the State capitol, where it is able to carry on the work of distributing R. E. A. literature to interested persons or groups, furnishing speakers for educational meetings, engineering services in the preparation of projects, and other assistance in forming organizations capable of qualifying for loans from the R. E. A.

Although privately owned utilities are eligible and may formulate projects and borrow money from the R. E. A. for the building of rural lines, very few have made application for loans, and those who have made application have been denied loans by reason of the fact that their retail rates were too high to meet the approval of the R. E. A. As a result, practically all of the activity through this office has been necessarily confined to the formation of cooperative organizations. A few municipally owned plants have made application, and the balance, or 95 percent, of the work of this office consists of projects sponsored by farmer cooperatives.

The desire for rural electrification in this State on the part of the farm groups has been unusual. For the past 5 years or more there has been practically no construction of rural electric lines and no desire for electrification has been manifested by the farmers to the privately owned utilities. Since the establishment of this office, however, the growth of the desire of farmers for rural electrification through projects financed by the R. E. A. has been tremendous.

This office has received approximately 600 written inquiries, has interviewed and advised approximately 1,000 farmers, has mailed out 7,000 pieces of R. E. A. literature, has received inquiries expressing interest in rural electrification from nearly 600 townships in this State, and has furnished township maps for proposed projects in 570 townships in this State.

As a result of the inquiries on the part of the farmers of this State and their desire for information concerning the R. E. A. program, this office has furnished speakers who have addressed 240 meetings, the total attendance at which is estimated to have been approximately 30,000 people.

As a result of this interest and activity, farmers have banded themselves together and have driven from farm to farm at their own expense for the purpose of promoting projects. From this activity we have received in this office consumer request blanks signed by more than 16,000 farmers. Seventeen projects have been completed and submitted to the R. E. A. at Washington for approval and allotment. These projects will require a loan allotment of approximately $2,400,000, and will require the building of 2,402 miles of high lines, designed to serve a minimum of 9,500 farm customers. Of these 17 projects, 7 have already been approved by the R. E. A. as to feasibility and self-liquidation.

In addition to the 17 projects heretofore submitted to the R. E. A., 6 additional projects are being completed in this office at this time. These projects cover 2,100 miles of line, proposed to serve a minimum of 6,800 customers and will require an allotment of approximately $2,000,000. Thus, projects which have already been completed in the field and are considered by this office to be feasible and self-liquidating will approximate 4,500 miles of high lines, serving approximately 16,000 farm customers, and will require an allotment of about $4,500,000. Another additional 1,500 miles of high lines, proposing to serve a minimum of 5,000 farm customers and will require an allotment of $1,500,000, are now in the formative stage and in the field at this time.

The formation of these projects by the farmers on a cooperative basis has awakened the privately owned utilities and spurred them to action. As a result some of the privately owned utilities in this State have rolled up their sleeves and put forth activity designed to retain the rural business which they have ignored for many years. Although the extensions on the part of the privately owned utilities in the rural areas during the past 5 years have been practically nil, the activity of this office, backed up by the good purposes which the R. E. A. at Washington has to offer, has crowded many of these companies into the field, resulting in a very substantial contribution to economic recovery in this State.

The chief reason for the activity of the privately owned utilities is the fear on their part that the establishment of cooperative projects will create a yardstick of power cost much lower than that in force among the private utilities, and that such yardstick will cause them to reduce the rates they are now collecting. In other words, this program for rural electrification is accomplishing the same results as the Federal program in the Tennessee Valley, in crowding the privately owned utilities into the field. Heretofore they have served only those areas which they considered the cream. They have overlooked and ignored some of the lean territory known as the skimmed-milk area. The R. E. A. projects aim to include as much of the skimmed-milk area as possible, and privately owned utilities are for the first time willing to take care of some of it.

In addition to the activity of many of the private companies in the willingness which they are showing in their desire to build rural lines, they have developed a very decided opposition to the cooperative projects. They have hampered them in their development by spreading propaganda in opposition to them. They have attempted to cripple them by building lines in strategic parts of contemplated projects. These lines, in some instances, have been built with no intention of serving even a single customer. They have been built to occupy highways in such a manner as to block R. E. A. loans or to pick out the cream of the territory, and thus reduce the density of customers in such manner as to leave the project unfeasible.

Such activity on the part of some of the companies in this State has caused much delay and confusion. A project of 650 miles in Rock and Jefferson Counties, heretofore approved by the R. E. A. as to feasibility and self-liquidation, has been split into two parts, and the work which should now have been under way in this project has not commenced. As a result of the splitting of the project, 225 miles which were to be built in Jefferson County are now to be built by a private company. The willingness of the farmers in this area to accept service from the private company has come about by reason of the private company's reduction in its rates and line-extension requirements. Where it heretofore required the farmer to pay approximately $15 per month for 36 months as a minimum guaranty, it now requires the payment of only $4 per month. In addition, the company is now willing to serve anyone in the area, many of whom it had heretofore refused to serve. As a result, more than 1,000 farmers in this area will be saved approximately $11 per month for 36 months, or a total of approximately $400,000.

Another 225 miles of electric lines in Walworth County and in one township in Rock County, heretofore organized as a part of one of the cooperative projects, is to be taken over and built by one of the privately owned utilities. This area will serve approximately 700 farmers, at a saving of more than $275,000 over the former requirements of the company.

In addition to these cooperative projects, approximating 450 miles of lines in the three counties heretofore referred to, much additional activity has been stimulated. The Wisconsin Gas & Electric Co. has 600 signed contracts which will require the building of approximately 200 miles of line. The Wisconsin-Michigan Power Co. has 446 signed contracts, which will require the building of approximately 150 miles of line. The T. M. E. R. & L. Co. has 260 contracts signed, which will require the building of approximately 85 miles of line.

The activity of other companies added to that of these 3 companies will bring about the building of nearly 1,200 miles of high lines by private utilities, requiring an expenditure of more than $1,000,000 and serving approximately 4,000 farms. Thus it is estimated that private utilities alone at this time have been stimulated and crowded into making a contribution of $1,000,000 toward economic recovery through the building of these high lines.

To recapitulate, these contributions toward economic recovery should be approximately as follows:

1. Activities of privately owned utilities in building approximately 1,200 miles of line to serve approximately 4,000 customers at an estimated expenditure of $1,000,000.

2. Cooperative and municipal utility projects now set up in this office and at Washington totaling 4,500 miles, serving approximately 16,000 consumers, and requiring an estimated expenditure of $4,500,000. All of the construction work to be done by privately owned, municipally owned, and cooperative projects in this State in 1936 can therefore be estimated to require an expenditure of approximately $6,000,000.

In estimating the contribution toward economic recovery which will result because of the stimulation or crowding of work by the private utilities and by the contemplated work of the municipal and cooperative projects, we cannot stop at this point. It can be readily seen that the building of the contemplated approximate 6,000 miles of high line will require expenditures other than the cost of the high line itself. Reliable estimates indicate that for every dollar spent for the building of high lines 3 additional dollars are expended for the wiring of buildings and the purchasing of appliances and other equipment. Thus, for the approximate contemplated $6,000,000 to be expended for high lines another $18,000,000 will be expended for wiring, appliances, equipment, and other purposes in connection therewith. Thus, for the projects which have been sent to Washington and totaling 2,402 miles of high line, of the 7,500 consumers who have expressed their wishes with respect to appliances which they contemplate purchasing, it is interesting to note the following contemplated use:

Refrigerators	2,118
Electric ranges	492
Washing machines	6,275
Irons	4,238
Radios	6,498
Utility motors	3,332
Milk coolers	24
Milking machines	1,451
Cream separators	304
Vacuum cleaners	2,719
Toasters	2,337
Water pumps	3,622
Water heaters	690
Miscellaneous	1,540

One of the important factors which has contributed to the success of the program for rural electrification is that it has been demonstrated that high lines can be constructed at a more reasonable cost. Prior to the creation of this office and the establishment of R. E. A., private companies insisted that the cost of high lines would average $1,500, and many of them claimed that the cost would exceed $2,000 per mile. In testimony before the public service commission the first part of March, engineers for private utilities testified that the minimum cost of high lines would be $1,250 per mile. The R. E. A. and this office has insisted that the cost should not exceed $1,000 per mile, and only a few days ago one company, in justifying its liberal line extension policies which it was putting into effect in the Jefferson territory, where it was supplanting the cooperative organizations, said that the line was to be built at a cost of $900 per mile. The driving down of the construction costs of these high lines, thus placing the price more within the reach of the average farmer, is of itself a contribution to economic recovery and will mean much in making possible a greater growth in the desire and demand of the farmers for rural electrification. Resulting from this there will be an added stimulus to our general return to better economic conditions.

It is to be regretted that the privately owned utilities in this State do not cooperate more with the R. E. A. program. Instead of attempting to break up the cooperative projects and refusing to give reasonable wholesale rates, such cooperation would make for a greater force toward general rural electrification and its resultant effect of spurring on business activity. This situation, however, is not peculiar to Wisconsin, because the same attitude and problem exists throughout the Nation.

Although it is a fact that none of the projects which have been submitted to Washington have reached the point where construction work has started; nevertheless it is now contemplated that it will not be very long before such construction work may be started. The 650-mile project in Rock and Jefferson Counties would be under construction today were it not for the activity of the private companies in splitting it, as has heretofore been explained. It had been singled out as the first project upon which construction work was to commence. The private-company activity, however, has required the Rock portion of the project to be resubmitted, with the result that it will have to be resubmitted for allotment. Progress has been made, however, in other projects. The Richland County project of 231 miles, the Columbia project of 244 miles, and the Dane-Iowa-Green project of 150 miles have been approved by the R. E. A. and are now before the Treasury Department for allotment. The first two of these projects have a municipal utility as their source of wholesale power, and unless some unforeseen difficulties arise should be under construction within the next 60 days. It is anticipated that with construction work commenced on one or two projects that such projects will then constitute a very great influence upon the remaining projects. Once under way, the contribution which rural electrification can make for economic recovery in Wisconsin should become very pronounced.

Dated at Madison, Wis., this 20th day of April 1936.

ORLAND S. LOOMIS,
Director, Rural Electrification Coordination.

PROCEDURE IN COMMITTEE

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAPES. During the debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the revenue bill on Friday the question was brought up at different times——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, what page does the gentleman expect to refer to?

Mr. MAPES. I shall refer to the pages in just a moment if the gentleman will permit.

The question was brought up at different times with regard to the latitude which should be allowed Members in the discussion of the tax bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union under the special order which was made in the House to consider that bill.

Certain Members were given permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD, and in looking over the record of the proceedings of Friday the question again arose in my mind, and I desire to ask the Speaker what latitude Members may exercise, not only in the debate that takes place on the floor during the consideration of the bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union but also in any extension of their remarks, and in that connection I call the attention of the Speaker to just what was done by the House in making in order the consideration of this bill.

If the Speaker will give me his attention for just a moment, and in answer to the gentleman from Alabama I may say that on page 5709 of the RECORD the gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. DOUGHTON, asked unanimous consent that—

> When the tax bill is taken up there may be 16 hours' general debate on the bill, the time to be equally divided between those favoring the bill and those opposing the bill, the time of those favoring the bill to be controlled by myself, and of those opposing the bill to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], and that the debate be confined to the bill.

This request was granted by the House. When the House convened on the morning of Thursday, April 23, the distinguished Democratic leader, Mr. BANKHEAD, addressing the House, said:

> Under the special order of the House, 16 hours has been provided for general debate on the bill, the debate to be confined to the bill. After conference with the Speaker of the House and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means we have reached the decision that it is most important for us to go through with the consideration of this bill without interruption, and therefore I want to give notice that I trust no Member of the House on either side will submit any request for special consideration to speak or for permission to speak out of order or for special time outside of the consideration of the bill as now provided.

I may say in passing that requests were made in the Committee of the Whole, or at least a request was made by one Member, to speak out of order, and the question was raised as to the power of the Committee to grant such request under this agreement, and, of course, the Chairman of the Committee very properly held that the Committee could not violate the express order of the House, although the individual Member seemed to take some offense at the rule being complied with. On April 24, page 6079 of the RECORD, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means submitted this request:

> Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days after the passage of the tax bill in which to extend their own remarks in the RECORD on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Was that request made in the House or in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

Mr. MAPES. It was made in the House, but the request was expressly confined, as the Speaker will note, to extensions of Members of their own remarks in the RECORD on the bill, for 5 legislative days after the passage of the bill.

I now wish to submit the question to the Speaker without making any reference to any individual remarks, because I assume the extensions were made in perfect good faith and, with one possible exception, they are extensions which would have been perfectly proper if permission had been given in the House for the Member to extend his remarks. My inquiry is, Is there any limitation upon the right of a Member to extend his remarks made in the Committee of the Whole on any subject or in any way he sees fit, and if there is, what the limitation is, keeping in mind the special order of the House that debate be confined to the bill, which I assume carries with it the assumption that extensions of remarks shall also be confined to the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WARREN. I think the gentleman should be specific both for the information of the House and especially for the information of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, who is presiding during the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MAPES. I may say to the gentleman that my inquiry is not directed at any decision of the Chairman of the Committee. The question which arises in my mind is with respect to extensions over which, of course, the Chairman of the Committee has no jurisdiction whatever.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, I do not know whether it is a mild indictment of me or not, and that is beside the mark, but I think the gentleman should be specific with the Speaker in pointing out what it is that has gone in the RECORD that should not have gone into the RECORD under this rule or agreement.

Mr. MAPES. Let me say to the gentleman from North Carolina that he knows, I think, that I would not attempt to indict him in any way, and I want to make this just as impersonal as possible, because in what I have said I do not want to convey any criticism of anybody, but I do think that for the integrity of the RECORD we ought to have some understanding about it. It does not seem to me that when the House has granted permission to Members to extend their remarks on the bill only that they have the right to wander all over the universe in making such extensions.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say this: I think an examination of the RECORD will disclose that if any extraneous matter was inserted, the Chair asked the question specifically was there objection, and if there is any—and frankly I think there has been some—the gentleman from Michigan who always religiously attends meetings of the House, was present and offered no objection at the time.

Mr. MAPES. What the gentleman says is correct; but it is to be assumed that the requests were made under the limitations which controlled the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and that the extension would be confined to the bill. A request in the Committee cannot overrule or override the express order of the House.

Mr. WARREN. If the gentleman will look at the RECORD he will see that the Chairman specifically asked the question was there objection to the inclusion of the papers. The gentleman from Michigan sat there and offered no objection and it went into the RECORD.

Mr. MAPES. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole did ask the question; there is no question about that. I have in mind no criticism of anybody, and particularly the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course, the Speaker will have no difficulty in answering the parliamentary inquiry submitted by the gentleman from Michigan. There is no question that under the consent given the remarks were to be confined to the bill. But the gentleman will recall, as well as the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, that even some members of the Ways and Means Committee departed very largely from the rule, although they were not called to order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF], and others, and even the gentleman from Michigan who is now speaking, departed somewhat from the limitation. Of course there is some latitude in these matters unless the Member is called to order.

The gentleman has not pointed out any specific ruling that could be made by the Chair except on general principles.

Mr. MAPES. I will state that I think it is largely a matter, or partly a matter, in the discretion of the individual Member in the first instance, and it is partly for the purpose of calling the attention of Members to the rule that I am raising the question.

The gentleman from Alabama mentioned individuals. I am going to refrain from mentioning any individual, although all the remarks or extensions that I have in mind were made by Members on the Democratic side of the Chamber. I think, if the gentleman from Alabama will read the remarks which I can point out to him, he will reach the conclusion that the extensions were not in compliance with the rule; and I may say to the gentleman that I think a great deal of latitude was indulged in on both sides of the House in discussion of the bill, although the particular remarks that I have in mind seem to me to go further than the others.

The SPEAKER. After all, the Chair must be guided by the rule of reason. Under the circumstances under which the bill is being considered, if we adhere to the orders of the House, debate must be confined to the subject matter of the bill, and any debate which does not confine itself to the subject matter of the bill or which is not in some way related to the tax matters under consideration would not be in order.

The Chair does not think the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, under the orders previously made, and to which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] has referred, would have the right to permit the inclusion of articles, editorials in newspapers, or magazine articles as a part of one's remarks, unless specific permission has been obtained from the House for that purpose.

Under the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] all Members of the House have 5 legislative days within which to extend their own remarks in the RECORD. The Chair calls attention of the House to the fact that the request was so worded and so granted, as appears in the RECORD, so as to limit such extensions to the subject of the tax bill. It is clear to the Chair that if any Member desires to insert editorials, articles in newspapers and magazines, or any matter other than the remarks uttered by him on the floor he would have to secure that permission from the House. The Committee of the Whole has no power to authorize the extension of matters which do not in some way relate to the tax bill under discussion.

Does that answer the gentleman's parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I think the Chair has answered the question as definitely as it can be answered. I take the answer of the Chair to mean that matters that are clearly extraneous to the tax bill cannot be included in extension of remarks, even though they are the Member's own statements.

The SPEAKER. That is true. Of course, as the Chair intimated at the outset, it is largely a matter of common sense in the application of the rule and its construction.

PAYMENT OF THE ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address by my colleague from Virginia [Mr. FLANNAGAN] on the soldiers' bonus.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted, I submit for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address delivered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLANNAGAN] at Norfolk on March 15:

After a long and bitter fight, we have won a great victory. And we have met here today in the city of the one who started that fight to celebrate that victory.

In the beginning may I pause for just a minute and pay tribute to one of your fellow townsmen, W. B. Shafer, Jr., who initiated the movement that finally resulted in doing simple justice to our soldier boys by paying them an honest debt long past due, and thereby removing a stain from our national honor. Did you ever stop to think that the first and only default this Government ever made in the payment of an honest debt was in the payment of the debt due the men who crossed the sea and fought in a foreign land to defend and uphold the name and honor of this Republic? Thank God that default has been wiped out! All honor to Mr. Shafer, who started the fight that wiped out the default.

It has been a long fight, at times a bitter fight, which makes the victory all the sweeter.

There were those arrayed against us, I am aware, who were honest, conscientious, patriotic men and women, and who fought the payment of the adjusted-service certificates from honest motives that satisfied their own consciences. Whatever the cause back of their opposition, I know they acted from honest motives, and for them I entertain the highest regard. I never criticize men because they fail to see things as I see things, if I know they are looking through honest and conscientious glasses.

But there were those arrayed against us who seemed to resent the soldier boys taking an interest in affairs of state. To them, let me say this: The man who defends his country in time of danger is certainly entitled, at least, to a voice in time of peace in the government he has defended and held secure. And may I add that, in my humble opinion, it is his duty to express that voice in such a way as to bring justice and fair treatment to his comrades in arms.

And there were those arrayed against us who had hogged—I know the word may grate upon the literary sensibilities of a certain element, but I use it advisedly because it expresses the thought I have in mind—this Government during the conflict, and who were determined to continue to hog this Government, even at the expense of the soldier boys, in time of peace. Cruel words, I hear some say. Yes; many truthful words are cruel words, but remember, I am applying them to cruel men. These are the fellows who ever clothe themselves in the raiment of the patriot, but whose patriotism is only vocal. There are the fellows who unfurled the flag and spread the wings of the eagle when the conflict was raging, the boys fighting at $1.10 per day, and they were putting on extra bookkeepers and auditors to keep track of the money they were making out of human misery and human suffering, but who, when the conflict was over, and the boys demanded in the name of simple justice that their compensation be adjusted as was contemplated in the beginning by the Congress, that their disabled be taken care of, and their sick ministered unto, draped themselves in the folds of Old Glory, posed as patriotic guardians of the Treasury, and used the beak and talons of the eagle to ward off the just claims and demands of the defenders of our country.

Let me make this proposition to these vocal patriots, whom gunpowder would affect like poison gas, and the crack of the rifle or the roar of the cannon would give the jitters, that the fighting patriots in this country are perfectly willing to fight for love of country plus clothing, bread, and meat, if they will stay at home and only receive as compensation for their home service the same kind of clothing, the same kind of meat, and the same kind of bread. Isn't that fair? Isn't that right and just? Why call upon the flower of American manhood in time of danger to make the supreme sacrifice and at the same time give the stay-at-home the opportunity of a lifetime?

Let me tell you something: You take the profit out of war and make the stay-at-homes undergo just a few of the many hardships that the soldier boy is subjected to daily and you will go a long way toward getting rid of war. But let me give you a sure recipe against war: The next time you write a draft law provide that the munitions makers, the international bankers, and the large industrialists are to be the first drafted and are to be the first to occupy the front-line trenches, and you will see old Mars retreat before a single draft board is set up.

We who have gathered here today, along with countless millions in this land, maintain that it is not right for some men to defend their country for love plus $1.10 per day, while others remain at home, only to capitalize financially on human suffering, human misery, and even death itself. If you conscript men to fight, you should also conscript men to keep the home fires burning. In other words, those who remain at home, under the protection of those who go to the front, should not be allowed to pocket a single dollar denied those who fight.

And we who have gathered here today, along with countless millions in this land, not only believe the soldiers were entitled to an adjustment, but we further believe that the adjustment should have been paid in cash back at the time the service was rendered and not with an I O U payable 26 years after the conflict and after the debt became due and payable.

But as strange as it may sound, after the war, in spite of the fact that the Congress, when the Selective Service Act was passed fixing the pay for soldiers, clearly indicated that an adjustment would be made after the conflict in the event it was deemed proper, and in spite of the fact that the Congress after the war solemnly adjudicated that an adjustment was proper and fixed the amount of the adjustment, we were told that the Government did not have the money, and this at the very time when we paid out in cash by way of this, that, and the other adjustment, several times the amount required to pay the adjusted-service certificates.

Let's look into some of the adjustments that were made at the time we were being told Uncle Sam was so hard up that he didn't have the money to pay our fighting men.

After the war we rewrote around 7,000 war contracts, making adjustments with the contractors, at a cost to the Government of several billion dollars. And we not only rewrote these contracts but we found the money to pay the adjustments in cash.

During the war we took over the railroads, agreeing to pay the owners a guaranteed return equal to the average return 3 years prior to our entry into the war, which was the most prosperous period of railroading in this country. After the war we adjusted these railroad contracts, agreeing to pay $3,000,000 per day for the next 6 months after being turned back. Although this adjustment amounted to between one and two billion dollars, we paid it in cash.

There were around 500,000 civilian employees during the war, each working for the Government under a contract that called for a certain salary per month or per year. After the war all these civilian employees who received $2,500 or less per year had their contracts rewritten and were given by way of adjusted compensation, on the average, $1,000 in extra pay. These adjustments were made in cash.

During the war many soldiers worked on the public roads in this country side by side with civilian employees who were receiving $8 per day. These soldiers who had never heard the crack of a rifle or the roar of a cannon had their pay adjusted, receiving by way of adjustment $7 per day, the difference between their soldier pay of $1 per day and the $8 per day drawn by the civilians. These adjustments were paid in cash.

After the war thousands of large income-tax payers had their income-tax returns rewritten or adjusted on the theory that they did not charge off a sufficient amount for depletion and depreciation. And while these refunds amounted between 1922 and 1929 to more than $3,000,000,000 they were paid in cash, plus 6 percent interest. The then Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon, made large refunds not only to himself but to his companies, and in every case Uncle Andy found the cash to pay the refunds plus interest, though at the same time he was advising the Congress that the Government could not raise the money to pay the adjustment found due the soldiers.

How, may I ask, can you justify cash adjustments to contractors, railroads, civilian employees, many soldiers who served at home, and income-tax payers, and at the same time adjust the payment due the fighting men with I O U's payable 26 years after the service was rendered?

And lest we forget, let me remind you of the fact that at the very time we were putting the soldier boys off with a hard-luck story, we were able to loan foreign nations billions of dollars—four or five times the amount required to pay the debt to the soldiers—knowing at the time that the foreign nations intended to use a part of the money to make a cash adjustment with their own soldiers.

Now, may I ask, can you justify loans to foreign nations in order for them to make a cash adjustment with their soldier boys, and at the same time adjust the payment with our soldier boys by giving them I O U's due 26 years after the service was rendered?

This treatment was not only unfair, it was unjust. It was not right. And while we love patriotism, which is only love of country, we should ever remember that unjust treatment is the germ that breeds resentment and disloyalty.

And so I welcome you here today to celebrate our great peacetime victory. And while the greater honors should go to the leaders in the movement, such as Shafer, Patman, Vinson, Van Zandt, and others, the glory is great enough to be shared by all, even by those of us who only fought as privates in the ranks.

And in welcoming you here, may I say that my beloved native land, the old Mother of States, welcomes you as men and women worthy of her parentage; as those who fought for a principle, not for a season but through the years and until the principle was established.

ROSS A. COLLINS

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address by Hon. Ross A. Collins, of Mississippi, on the Leadership of the President.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which was delivered by Hon. Ross A. Collins before the Democratic League of the District of Columbia on April 24, 1936:

Ladies and gentlemen of the Democratic League, the Republicans are fond of speaking of experience and the lessons to be derived from it. It is true that experience and knowledge are mutually corrective and advance together. However, it is not a simple matter to ascertain the lessons of experience insofar as social problems are concerned. One is very much under the dominance of traditional ideas and they often predetermine his conceptions to a point that he totally misunderstands the lessons of experience and misconstrues the facts. Therefore, we constantly have to revise our conceptions of social problems. The Republicans want to keep us back in the seventeenth century and are irritable at the fact that all attainments of knowledge in the social field have gone against their pet doctrines.

This is not a new phenomenon; throughout the ages in one form or another there have been those interested in keeping the world stationary; the invariable result has been that they have been swept away and their doctrines repudiated. We have such examples in our short history as a nation. All social measures are experiments, and though it may be wise to advance with caution, it does not mean that it is possible to lag too much behind in the solution of pressing problems, or to repudiate proposed solutions because they depart from traditional ideas. History has abundantly shown that such an attitude is often a too high price for any nation to pay.

Such has been the attitude of the orthodox Republicans during the present crisis. The Republican Party has been identified with big-money interests. These interests are financing a campaign against the President based on criticism of details, attempting to magnify these details enough to becloud the whole picture in the minds of the voters. There is a determined attempt to distract the attention of the people to a few faulty details, instead of discussing the whole policy of the administration agencies, their aims, the measures taken to attain them, to what extent these aims have been realized, and how far these measures have stimulated recovery or attained the readjustment necessary for a more balanced position between agriculture, industry, labor, trade, etc., fractions of the community.

The Republican Party is seeking "issues" and slogans to draw away the attention of the people from the imperative needs of the present, and the achievements of the first Roosevelt administration. Why? Because it is not in a position to adopt a program equal to the requirements of present conditions. It is under the control of privileged wealth. If progressive elements asserted themselves, it would mean a repudiation of the fundamentals and traditional policies of the party—a split and disintegration would be the result. The very criticism made to the measures enacted so far—a criticism intensively carried on under various formulas (unconstitutionality, socialism, regimentation, etc.) has been directed at the slight adjustments which these measures effected. It is a campaign demonstrating the fact that the Republicans have no alternative except a tendency of evasion of the problems of the present crisis.

For instance, planning in the economic field has been condemned as unnecessary interference on the part of the Government. Yet planning is but a more sound form of formulation of an economic policy; that is, ascertaining the causes of an undesirable situation with a greater measure of exactitude and care, and attempting a solution of the problems on their merits with a knowledge of their requirements, instead of remaining inactive and let chaos drag down the whole economic structure of the country and reduce the numbers of our Nation to poverty and discontent that may take the forms of degeneration, crime, and total violence.

Every policy involves a degree of regulation by the Government. As our Republican friends would have it, when a measure benefits the upper few, as is the case with the tariff, at the expense of the masses of the people, then it is not interference on the part of the Government, it is constitutional and sound; but when a measure is intended to benefit some section of the mass of the people (farmers, labor, tradesmen, etc.), then it is condemned under a number of formulas (unconstitutionality, undue interference, socialism). As a matter of fact, the tariff and the A. A. A. fundamentally rest on the same principle. If the people accept the one, by the same token they must support the other; realizing that the interdependence of the various economic activities, in the long run, benefits them also. But accumulated wealth is uneasy, afraid of precedents of such mutual assistance as disturbing the existing state of disproportion in the exploitation of the national resources and the producing and consuming capacities of the Nation.

Thus the New Deal has been condemned by Republicans as a departure from traditional democracy. This very criticism shows that our opponents admit that it has not been merely a new slogan aiming to evade the solution of difficult problems, but has advanced so far toward their solution as to make the partisans of privilege panicky and bent on getting rid of the measures of the present administration.

The true tradition of the Democratic Party has been to meet the problems of the Nation from the point of view of the great mass of the people. New problems, complex and difficult, have called for new solutions, and the present administration has boldly advanced toward their solution, making use of the knowledge and experience that the country has to offer.

Jeffersonian Democracy and Rooseveltian Democracy are essentially the same; neither looks backward nor closes its eyes to the requirements of the present and the dangers of the future. Both have been and will be as progressive as the problems of the times impose. It was no one else but Jefferson who realized that social requirements and knowledge change so rapidly as to require constant revision of policies and laws, including perhaps the Constitution itself, from generation to generation.

Our opponents are unable to deny that the measures of the Roosevelt administration have brought about recovery. It has come and is progressing. They must answer, then, how was it possible for such bad, utopian measures to be so effective as to bring back so rapidly an economic structure which under the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover regime had reached the point of total collapse. The leader of the present opposition was eager 3 years ago to retire in silence and exile himself. This same leader is becoming vociferous of late to the point of poor taste, displaying the naive belief that this is still the good old time in which politics was a game of rhetoric, high-sounding slogans, and issues intended to conceal evasive positions. If one takes the trouble to reduce this verbosity to a social platform, one easily will find its meaning—neutralization of all readjustment measures and going back to the big-money ideas with as little deviation as possible. It is hardly necessary for me to stress the point of the meaning of such a step.

Recently we are hearing criticism also in connection with the problem of unemployment; that the present administration has not solved it. The fact is that it has reduced but not solved it. Why? For the simple reason that the administration has advanced by degrees slowly, cautiously, and very conservatively toward the solution of the complexity of economic problems. We have had to rebuild the old structure by stimulating economic life upward; a policy of reconstruction, not of violence and destruction, taking full advantage of the natural forces of recovery. In other words, while progressive, the administration has been soundly conservative.

If we face the problem of unemployment frankly, we must admit that even now unemployment cannot be eliminated without further readjustments. Nevertheless, we have the accusations of the Republicans that the New Deal is radicalism. Do they mean to accept widespread unemployment as a permanent condition? Is that their philosophy of hopelessness; that the condition cannot be remedied and hence the people must starve? Could anything be so conclusive of the utter incapacity of the Republican Party of attaining a solution of our problems?

All sorts of wisecracks have been made about the agencies of the Government intended to afford relief in one form or another to the unfortunate victims of unemployment. The Nation shoulders the burden, and it is privileged wealth that is worried about it. The most interesting point is, however, in the question as to how did this situation come about that so many citizens found themselves on the streets and thus became a burden to the National Treasury. The answer is that the economic policy of past governments has allowed such extreme laissez faire to dislocate the population of the country; to upset their source of subsistence without insuring itself that those responsible for this dislocation and its eventual consequences meet the expenses it involves.

In this manner it is quite clear that those who are responsible for this expense of the Nation are the ones most vociferous against expenditures to relieve the situation and stimulate a normal movement. The Nation pays for their sins, and, of course, what they are uneasy about is that they may be forced out of their vested wealth to help pay for measures necessary to correct the evils they have created, measures being taken to prevent drastic upsets in unemployment, to afford some measure of security to the wage earners and agriculture, and to the National Treasury itself.

We have heard much talk about extravagance. The opponents of the administration certainly cannot say that the relief afforded the unemployed has been extravagant. Their objections are directed at expenditures in general to the point of a cynical interpretation of the popularity of the measures of the Government as partisan calculation. An appreciation of the distress of the masses or the consequences of the continuity of an upset economic structure is so foreign to these gentlemen that they have not hesitated even to coin phrases at the expense of the millions of unemployed countrymen. To protect their property interests today they would let millions starve and go in want, blind to the fact that they could not devise a policy more certain in the end to accomplish their own complete destruction.

Another of their proposals is to balance the Budget. Has this country always had a balanced Budget, even under normal conditions? By no means. Half of the years of its existence the country has not balanced its Budget. More than that, there have been times when the financial medium of the country has been worthless, yet the Nation overcame this, grew and expanded on the basis of the natural resources and the industry of the people. The situation is far from being such at the present time. The Nation has a sound and adequately backed currency and ample credit to meet the requirements of the present crisis. Are we to succumb to old-fashioned calculations in order to let privilege remain immune, and risk social unrest, or are we to be true Americans and Democrats and relieve the great mass of the people affected by the present crisis, and thus relieve the economic distress of the country as a whole? What does the demand for balancing the Budget at this time mean? It means a premature abandoning of all measures of stimulation and relief connected with expenditures. It is hardly necessary to point out that such a step at this time will result in a relapse so rapid as to destroy all that has been gained with such effort to the point that at the end of the financial year the Budget balanced on paper will prove to have remained unbalanced in fact. Because it means nothing to balance the Government Budget if the people's budget remains permanently unbalanced. Even the lords of finance recognize the fact that public finance is something entirely different from the old-fashioned arithmetic which the Republicans employ in considering the financial problems of the country.

The opponents of the administration are fond of high-sounding words; they speak of ideals and think in terms of money. They condemn materialism if it shows a tendency toward a social equilibrium, and yet their conception of liberty is purely materialistic, while the spiritual and intellectual impulses of the Nation be repressed to the point of insuring the dominance of the orthodox dogma in social problems. They constantly condemn communism. Yet orthodox Republicanism has the greatest affinities with it. Republicanism and communism represent the two extremes of a one-sided materialism (laissez faire and complete social control). The present attainments of political economy have repudiated both equally.

That is why the cry against the specialists and against the measures undertaken by the present administration. That is why, instead of solutions, they propose ill-considered demands and contradictory slogans.

The present administration has been practically active in every field of national economy, agriculture, farm credit, labor, and industry, electric power, housing problems, public works, transportation, foreign trade, emergency relief. In all these fields the results have been felt and appreciated by the great numbers of the people as an effort to approach the problems without preconception and solve them on their merits. That is why we rely on the instinct and common sense of the mass of people with utmost confidence. That is why our opponents are dissatisfied with the "education" of this same people who prefer to support those who attend to their problems and give them a chance to make an honest living instead of a perpetual temporizing and waiting for miracles to happen and feeding them on slogans like the notorious "prosperity around the corner."

It is astonishing and dismaying to note the extent to which the lords of finance have concentrated their fear that their vested interests may be disturbed into hatred of one man. A recent magazine article says that the outstanding political development of the last year is that Franklin Roosevelt's opponents now hate him with profound passion, as exemplified by the depth of the bitterness of the excesses of the Liberty League and its allies and by the vast number of wholly malicious rumors attacking the President.

Fortunately, this fanatical hatred which has taken hold on some people who have found that their gods of gold had feet of clay is more than compensated by the grateful love and admiration of millions of people who realize that Franklin D. Roosevelt, as the leader of our new democracy, has opened to them new gates of hope and has saved and restored to them a Government which was toppling on the brink of collapse at the end of the old regime. As time goes along it is more and more apparent that the American people are not going to be led, like dumb beasts, to the slaughter at the hands of the ancient vested oligarchy, but that they are rallying in tremendous and overwhelming majorities to the leadership of Franklin Roosevelt and the practical application of the new ideals for which he and his administration stand.

The motion was agreed to.

THE REVENUE BILL OF 1936

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12395) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12395, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 hour to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein certain tables, charts, and other matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman, in reference to his request for extension, that the Speaker has ruled that that authority should be obtained from the House rather than from the Committee. The gentleman already has authority to extend his own remarks without further permission.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, as I heard the Speaker's ruling, permission to include remarks that are extraneous must be obtained in the House. My request, of course, is with respect to remarks confined to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the procedure so far gentlemen on both sides of the aisle under the privilege of extension have placed in the RECORD documents and quotations from documents that are extraneous to the bill, but under the ruling of the Speaker the Chair thinks that the gentleman from Kentucky should obtain further permission when we get back in the House.

The gentleman is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, it will be my purpose to address my remarks to the tax bill under consideration. [Applause.] I am armed with the report of the subcommittee, with the report of the full committee, with copies of the hearings and a copy of the bill. When I conclude my remarks I will be very happy to yield to any Member of the House for questions. The debate upon this bill shows development to the *n*th degree of the desire and purpose of our minority friends to confuse the issue. With warm personal feeling and friendship for the minority members of the Ways and Means Committee, and without any feeling of rancor in the matter, I ask the House and the country, What objections have been presented to this measure, either in the report or on the floor of the House, other than generalities of conclusions rather than arguments that appeal to the intellectual processes?

Our Republican friends begin the minority report with the statement:

Increased taxes versus reduced expenditures.

Again there is nothing except generalities. No effort is made to point to a specific dollar that could be saved through reducing expenditures. They say that too much money is being spent, and, frankly, I agree with them on this point—but, I ask the question, Who is spending the money? The Congress of the United States must appropriate every dollar of the taxpayers' money that is spent by the Government. As a matter of fact, the situation has been such that the needs of the unfortunate unemployment condition, the hangover from the Hoover administration, have been a tremendous money burden, but, getting down to brass tacks, our friends of the minority have, with deliberate and calculating cunning, refused to specify the spending that they would curtail. They issue a blanket indictment and refuse to submit a bill of particulars. Their real attitude, however, boiled down, is set forth in the minority report. After stating their views in regard to reduction in governmental expenditures they say "until that—(reduction of expenditure)—is done, we are opposed to the imposition of any new tax burden on business or the people."

So we start off with the idea that no tax bill would suit our friends of the minority in this session of Congress. This is their position, even though for months and months prior hereto they have lectured and chastised the party in power with negligence, and even cowardice, for failing to bring in a tax bill that would balance the Budget. I do not say this in severity because I realize that this is a campaign year and that our friends on the minority, for political reasons, may justify their shifting their positions with the winds.

THE SIZE OF THE BILL

The fact that there are 236 pages in this bill is cited in argument against it. Its opponents make much of the fact that there are 236 pages in it; a columnist has referred to it and its technical language; radio broadcasters talk about the length of time required to read it; editorial writers, following the Republican lead, deal with its voluminous size. Frankly, unless a person understood the situation, it is an awesome sight to contemplate. However, let us analyze this particular situation and argument.

In the bill introduced there are 236 pages. In the committee print, which carried the language in the existing law that is not contained in the bill under consideration, there are 249 pages; consequently, by simple subtraction, there are 13 pages of existing law that are omitted from this bill.

The bill under discussion is built in the following manner: The committee took the Revenue Act of 1934, as amended, and used it as a base for H. R. 12395. The revenue laws now in full force are not affected for the taxable years prior to the effective date of this act. We do not repeal existing revenue laws as affecting past taxable years. To do so would see confusion confused. We reenact, for the taxable years involved, so much of existing law as is desired and necessary.

The committee has taken the Revenue Act of 1934, as amended, and has recommended its reenactment, subject to the changes therein necessary to accomplish the purpose of the proposed plan. Excluding the tax on unjust enrichment—the "windfall" tax—and refunds of floor stock tax, which two titles take up 16 pages of the new bill, there are 220 pages of the present bill dealing with the corporate-income tax. The entire new language in the bill covers about 47 pages, of which only 31 pages deal with the corporate-income plan. In other words, while this measure appears to be a real volume, the actual new matter covers only about 47 pages. Now this does not mean that all that was necessary to do was to write these pages and stick them in the bill. Throughout the bill there are amendments to the existing law, and it was necessary for the committee to virtually dissect the existing laws and make the changes applicable. In some instances it was only necessary to make a change in the rates; in other instances language is stricken which, under the new plan, was not necessary; in still other instances entire new sections were included to express the new plan.

The point that we want to especially emphasize is that while the bill numbers 236 pages there are only about 47 pages of new matter. It might be well at this time to call the attention of the House to the size of similar bills as presented to it heretofore for consideration. In 1924, 1926, and 1928 bills were presented to the House for its consideration which called for reduction in existing income taxes.

Then in 1932, when we had the Hoover administration but a Democratic House, in response to the request of the Treasury and President Hoover, the Democratic Ways and Means Committee rose to their responsibility and presented a tax bill increasing revenues pursuant to their request. That bill contained 278 pages. The much-praised Revenue Act of 1934, which had only 7 votes in the House against it, contained 232 pages. So I do not think anybody need be frightened by the awesome spectacle of 236 pages when 80 percent of it is existing law.

COMPLEXITY OF THE BILL

It is stated that the proposed bill is complex. For that matter, the existing revenue laws are complex—the business structure of the country is complex. We must tax business as we find it. It is because of the versatility of the legal minds advising the taxpayer to create complexity of business structures that requires the close attention in the language used in revenue acts to secure any taxes from such favored taxpayers. I say, without fear of any contradiction, that there is more complexity in the existing laws which we reenact as a part of this revenue measure than in the new language contained herein.

I want to read to you a statement from the hearings upon the present bill by a man who knew what he was talking about, Ellsworth C. Alvord, who in 1921 came with the drafting service. In 1922 he came from the Senate to the House. Then he remained here and helped draft this complicated system of existing law. I say to you that no one is more able to speak of its complexities than Mr. Alvord. Leaving the legislative counsel he went into the service of the Treasury and then we find him as special assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury. Then later, as I understand, personal counsel for Andrew W. Mellon in some of his tax complexities. He is an expert and knows whereof he speaks.

I read:

Mr. ALVORD. Perhaps I am in position to dicuss the complexities of our present tax law. Certainly, at least as much as anyone else, I regret the utter impossibility of the present situation. The statute is unreadable—

He is talking about existing law—

The statute is unreadable, beyond comprehension, and ambiguous. The maze of regulations, ruling, and decisions is appalling.

There is no certainty. Tax liabilities are not known and cannot be computed. There is no finality within a reasonable period of time. Regulations are amended, and rulings reversed, frequently with retroactive application. Litigation is prolonged. The expense to the taxpayer and the Government adds a heavy load to the tax burden. I predict that our present income-tax system will some day fall of its own weight. I am forced to accept my share of the responsibility.

That is the indictment he returns against the existing tax law. I want to be frank and candid in respect to the matter. He said this bill would probably make it worse, although he made certain suggestions as to simplifications that might be made, and I submit we have made almost all of them.

One of his objections to this measure was something that they hoped would be in it but which is not there, God bless them. They have been grabbing and grasping for something vulnerable about this tax measure. They put it out over the whole country that it would require an algebraic formula to compute the tax. Mr. Alvord, expert that he is, asked whether we would have an algebraic formula or tables to compute the tax. Now, there is no algebraic formula in the bill, even though the eminent opponents asserted one would be necessary.

Now, as an example of simplicity, which, as I recall, is a part of the handiwork of our friend, Mr. Alvord, I read herewith the section of existing revenue laws that we commonly refer to as the China Trade Act, enacted under a Republican administration:

CHINA TRADE ACT CORPORATIONS

SEC. 263. (a) For the purpose only of the tax imposed by section 230 there shall be allowed, in the case of a corporation organized under the China Trade Act, 1922, a credit of an amount equal to the proportion of the net income derived from sources within China (determined in a similar manner to that provided in sec. 217) which the par value of the shares of stock of the corporation owned on the last day of the taxable year by (1) persons resident in China, the United States, or possessions of the United States, and (2) individual citizens of the United States or China wherever resident, bears to the par value of the whole number of shares of stock of the corporation outstanding on such date: Provided, That in no case shall the amount by which the tax imposed by section 230 is diminished by reason of such credit exceed the amount of the special dividend certified under subdivision (b) of this section.

(b) Such credit shall not be allowed unless the Secretary of Commerce has certified to the Commissioner—

(1) The amount which, during the year ending on the date fixed by law for filing the return, the corporation has distributed as a special dividend to or for the benefit of such persons as on the last day of the taxable year were resident in China, the United States, or possessions of the United States, or were individual citizens of the United States or China, and owned shares of stock of the corporation;

(2) That such special dividend was in addition to all other amounts, payable or to be payable to such persons or for their benefits, by reason of their interest in the corporation; and

(3) That such distribution has been made to or for the benefit of such persons in proportion to the par value of the shares of stock of the corporation owned by each; except that if the corporation has more than one class of stock, the certificates shall contain a statement that the articles of incorporation provide a method for the apportionment of such special dividend among such persons, and that the amount certified has been distributed in accordance with the method so provided.

(c) For the purposes of this section shares of stock of a corporation shall be considered to be owned by the person in whom the equitable right to the income from such shares is in good faith vested.

(d) As used in this section the term "China" shall have the same meaning as when used in the China Trade Act, 1922.

Opponents of the present bill say that the language of the bill under discussion is complicated and that it cannot be administered, but I suggest that anyone that can understand the language in the China Trade Act and any Bureau of Internal Revenue that can administer such an act, as it is doing, can certainly understand and administer this proposal much more easily.

THE SCHEDULES IN THE BILL

But to get back to the bill under discussion. Confusion is pretended to exist in respect of the tables set out in the bill to enable the taxpayer to know what the rate of tax in his particular case is. The bill is taken in hand and they say, "What does column 1 and column 2 on page 15 mean?" If you do nothing more than look at it, it means nothing to you, but if you will read the four lines next preceding these tables it becomes as simple as anything can be.

Column 1 is the percentage of retained income. This figure is arrived at by dividing the adjusted net income into the undistributed net income (retained net income). Now, if it comes out to an even percentage you will find that figure in column 1. Then column 2, opposite column 1 in the table, is the rate of tax for such percentage of adjusted net income that is undistributed. For example, say your adjusted net income is $100 and you desire to retain $10: Divide $100, the adjusted net income, into $10, the amount retained, and you get ten one-hundredths or 10 percent. We know, without computation, that $10 is 10 percent of $100, but the same rule will apply regardless of what the amount retained is. Now, in column 1 we have 10 percent retained and opposite, in column 2, you see at a glance that the tax rate applicable is 1 percent of the adjusted net income. Therefore, the tax in this instance would be $1, in lieu of the present tax of $12.50. In the event a retention of 20 percent is desired, or $20 in the above case, the tax rate applicable would be 3½ percent or $3.50. If the retention desired amounts to 30 percent, a rate of 7½ percent would apply or a tax of $7.50; under a 40-percent retention a tax rate of 13 percent would apply or $13 tax would be paid in the last-above-cited case.

The use of these tables is so simple that the only explanation that I can give of criticism of them is that the critics have not read the four lines next preceding the table or that they intentionally do not want to understand the mechanics of the bill.

Our friends over on the other side of the aisle have never tried to understand the bill. The first thing they did when this finished bill was given to them was to pore over it to see if that algebraic formula was in it; and it was the most disappointed crowd you ever saw when they found it was not there. Let me tell you, that is so. Instead of putting in an algebraic formula we have made it more simple than existing law. We have given you the brackets by 1 percent instead of by brackets of 10 percent. We have broken it down into 1-percent graduations. So that if you have an even percentage, if the undistributed net income is an even percentage of the adjusted net income all you have to do is to turn to the table and immediately you determine the rate of tax.

I submit that where the amount retained is an even percentage it is much easier to ascertain the tax to be paid by the taxpayer than it is to ascertain what the surtax is under existing law—that is, of course, to anyone who really wants to understand the workings of the new plan.

THE IPTERPOLATOR

Frankly, if the amount retained is not an even percentage, it does become slightly more difficult to ascertain the rate, but anybody who can read and who can add, subtract, multiply, and divide will not have any difficulty in ascertaining the rate of tax applicable to his own individual case. I have noted that certain papers have picked up this language and printed it as not being understandable. I quote from the bill (pp. 15 and 16):

If the undistributed net income is a percentage of the adjusted net income which is more than 10 and less than 20 (and such percentage is not shown in the foregoing table) the tax shall be a percentage of the adjusted net income equal to the sum of 1, plus one-fourth of the amount by which the percentage which the undistributed net income is of the adjusted net income exceeds 10.

Of course, with this language alone, you have no beginning or ending, but when you take it in connection with the table next above it in the bill, and with the language preceding the table in the bill, it is not so complex. An illustration of the workings of it might be helpful here:

We still use the adjusted net income of $100. In this particular instance the taxpayer wants to retain $14.50 in his surplus. Now we glance at table 1 in the bill—there is no percentage for $14.50 and the query arises—"What rate will be applied in this case?" By reading the bill you will find that the section which we have just quoted is the applicable section. The percentage retained in this case is more than 10 and less than 20 percent of the adjusted net income. This language says that the tax rate will be the sum of 1 plus one-fourth of the amount by which 14.50 exceeds 10. We therefore subtract 10 from 14.50 and the result, we find, is 4.50. Multiplying this by one-fourth or 0.25 we get a product of 1.12½. Now add this product to 1 and you get 2.12½ percent. Multiplying the $100 by this percentage—2.12½—you will find that the tax payable will be $2.12½.

It works likewise from the dividend end. If the dividend declared is an even percentage of the adjusted net income we run our pencil down to whatever this percentage may be in column 1 and find opposite it in column 2, the tax rate applicable.

If the dividend distributed is not an even percentage, then you take your interpolator and ascertain the rate. For instance, assume the adjusted net income is $100 and it is desired to pay out in dividends $75.50, which, of course, we know is not an even percentage of the total adjusted net income. By reading the bill, we find this language applicable to the assumed case:

If the dividend credit is a percentage of the adjusted net income which is more than 62.5 and less than 76.5 (and such percentage is not shown in the foregoing table) the tax shall be a percentage of the adjusted net income equal to the sum of 3.5 plus two-sevenths of the amount by which 76.5 exceeds the percentage which the dividend credit is of the adjusted net income.

Now, following the language of the bill, we subtract 75½ (the percentage of the adjusted net income desired to be paid out in dividends) from 76½ and we have 1. Following the bill, two-sevenths of 1 is two-sevenths, which, reduced to percentage, equals 0.2857 percent—add this to 3.50 percent and we have 3.7857 percent. Applying this percentage to the adjusted net income of $100 we have an applicable tax of $3.79.

Just a few minutes ago a distinguishing gentleman of this House, Mr. SHANLEY, went to a member of the drafting service and wanted to know why we put in these interpolators. Well, we could say that it was interpolated according to the straight-line method. Then our language could have been omitted. We put the language in because some folks might not understand what is meant by interpolating according to the straight-line method. We drew the actual picture, and I say it is plain enough that even the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] can understand it if he wants to do so.

SCHEDULES 2 AND 2A. BASED ON UNDISTRIBUTED NET INCOME AND ON DIVIDEND CREDIT FOR CORPORATION WITH ADJUSTED NET INCOME OF MORE THAN $10,000

Computations under these schedules are figured in exactly the same manner as illustrated in the foregoing paragraph under schedules 1 and 1A.

SCHEDULE 3. ALTERNATIVE SCHEDULE FOR ADJUSTED NET INCOME OF MORE THAN $10,000 AND LESS THAN $40,000

Now, we had this situation arise. Remember, we are trying to draft a tax bill that is fair and just.

Schedules 1 and 1A deal with corporations with net incomes of less than $10,000. There is no concern whatsoever as to corporate size. It may be a corporation with capital of $1,000 or $1,000,000; the only requisite for securing the lesser tax rate is to have an adjusted net income of $10,000 or less. The same thing applies to schedules 2 and 2A. The condition that deprives the taxpayer of the use of lower rate is his having an adjusted net income of more than $10,000. Our study developed the fact that the increase in rates would be quite abrupt and very unfair to taxpayers in a certain intermediate field. In schedule 1 corporations with net incomes of $10,000 and less, the rate applicable, on basis of 10-percent retention, is 1 percent, while the rate applicable on corporations with adjusted net incomes of more than $10,000 is 4 percent. Under schedule 1 corporations retaining 20 percent, with adjusted net income of $10,000 and less, pay 3½ percent, while under schedule 2 the rate is 9 percent; corporations retaining 30 percent of their adjusted net income under schedule 1 would pay 7½ percent, while under schedule 2 they would pay 15 percent. As an illustration of the situation, assume that a corporation under schedule 1 has a net income of $10,000 and desires to retain 30 percent; the tax would be $750. If the corporation had an adjusted net income of $10,001 under schedule 2, the tax would be $1,500, or a tax of $750 on $1 over $10,000 of adjusted net income.

In order to level out the inequality of such a condition, we adopted schedule 3, which affects corporations having adjusted net income of more than $10,000 and less than $40,000. The option is given to the taxpayer to compute his tax under schedule 2 and 2A or schedule 3—paying the lesser tax. As this works out, corporations having an adjusted net income of less than $40,000, retaining 10 percent will pay less than that called for under schedules 2 and 2A. Corporations with adjusted net income of $25,700, retaining 20 percent will pay less tax than under schedules 2 or 2A; and corporations with adjusted net income of less than $20,000, retaining 30 percent will pay less than they would pay under schedules 2 and 2A. There are 257,000 corporations making a report of net incomes and of this number 214,000 will have adjusted net incomes of less than $10,000 and will use the lesser rates under schedules 1 and 1A. There are 17,852 corporations having net incomes between $10,000 and $20,000 and such number of these corporations having adjusted net incomes of less than $20,000 and retaining 30 percent will pay a lesser rate than under schedules 2 and 2A. There are 22,881 corporations with reported adjusted net income of between $10,000 and $25,000. All such corporations with adjusted net incomes of less than $25,700 and retaining 20 percent will pay less tax under schedule 3 than under schedules 2 and 2A. There are 29,834 corporations with reported net incomes of between $10,000 and $40,000. Such corporations with adjusted net incomes of less than $40,000, retaining 10 percent will pay less tax than they will under schedules 2 and 2A.

It is stated to us by the actuarial experts in the Treasury that corporations having net incomes of $10,000 or less can retain 42 percent of their net incomes and still pay the same tax as they are now paying under existing law; that corporations having more than $10,000 with rates figured under schedules 2 and 2A can retain 31.9 percent of their adjusted net income and pay the same tax as they are paying under existing law. Of course, this would mean that practically all those corporations in the intermediate class could retain a larger percentage of their adjusted net income and still pay the same tax as they do today.

Schedule 3 is said by some to be tremendously difficult. In order to clarify this in the minds of the Members, we give an illustration of the method that would be followed in making computation under this section:

Assume that a corporation has an adjusted net income of $15,000 and 30-percent retention is desired—what would be their tax?

Apply the low rate in schedule 1 to the entire $15,000. The table shows you that that rate is 7½ percent—$15,000 times 7½ gives you $1,125. Subtract $10,000 from $15,000, and you have $5,000, which is the excess of $15,000 under schedule 1. Now apply the high rate of 15 percent, the rate applicable in schedule 2 with 30-percent retention, to such excess, $5,000, and you have $750. Add the $1,125 and $750, and you have a total of $1,875, the tax to be paid.

To compute the tax under schedule 2, simply take the $15,000 adjusted net income and multiply it by the applicable rate for 30-percent retention, which would be 15 percent, and you get $2,250. As illustrated by this computation, the taxpayer in making his return will pay the lesser rate, or a tax of $1,875, and save $375 because of this optional treatment for the intermediate corporation that is provided in the bill.

Straight-line method is used in arriving at the tax rates for the intermediate corporations. The merging point for 10-percent retention is $40,000; for 20-percent retention, $25,700; and for 30-percent retention, $20,000. Passing the merging points, the applicable rates in schedules 2 and 2A are used.

CUSHIONS

At one time it was thought that all corporations should receive the same treatment under the proposed plan. Some of us felt that there should be preferred treatment accorded taxpayers who were in need of it. Such thought was the father of the classifications of corporations heretofore discussed. In respect of net incomes, giving a material preference in rates to the corporations with smaller net incomes.

The graduated rates under schedules 1 and 1A, as compared with other schedules, follow the same principles and philosophy that are the basis of the graduation in the present individual surtax brackets—it is an income tax; a graduated income tax with lesser rates on the lesser incomes. In all the criticism that has been forthcoming, I have heard none arraigned against the classification of corporations according to whether the net income is more than $10,000, nor have I heard any criticism of the ratio of the rates in schedules 1 and 1A as compared to schedules 2 and 2A.

Criticism has been hurled at the maximum rates provided in the schedules, particularly to the maximum rates applicable to schedules 2 and 2A; namely, the 42½-percent rate. It is natural that this should be the object of political criticism, owing to the fact that the difference between such rates and rates under existing law, approximately 16.4 percent, is considerably larger than the difference between the 29½-percent rate under schedules 1 and 1A and existing law, approximately 14.2 percent.

At one time the corporate rate in Great Britain was 27½ percent—only 2 percent less than the maximum rates under schedules 1 and 1A. This was a flat rate. It is true that by steps this rate was reduced to a 22½-percent rate, which is the existing rate in Great Britain today. However, within the past few days it has been proposed to increase this rate from 22½ percent to 23¾ percent.

When 42 percent of the adjusted net income of a corporation of this class can be retained without the imposition of any additional tax it is apparent that the surplus of such corporation will not be weakened. I make this statement because it is shown that the average amount of net income retained in surplus over the period of the last 10 years is approximately 30 percent, and over the 15-year period next preceding it has averaged approximately 25 percent. It would seem to me that the larger corporations, and particularly those who are using the corporate devices for the purpose of avoiding personal-income tax in the surtax brackets, would average a higher rate of retention than the smaller corporations. Certainly it is true that in the corporations with smaller net income there are numerically more closely held corporations than in those with larger incomes, and naturally in the smaller field there is more need for dividend payments to provide a livelihood. Certainly there is not the natural desire to evade the higher surtax rates, because such shareholders are not within them—or, if within them, the amount of dividends received from corporations with net incomes of less than $10,000 would be so small as to make the increase in tax hardly appreciable to them. However, we have endeavored to protect the working capital of corporations both large and small with certain added rates. Some are prone to refer to them as relief provisions, and our opponents immediately point out that there is an increase in the relief rates in excess of rates under existing law. The rate itself is an increase over the existing rates, but the tax that may come from the combined treatment of the relief provisions and the proposed plan may be substantially less than the corporate tax paid by the taxpayer today. In any event, a rate of 22½ percent is less than the rate of 29½ percent against which maximum rate the provisions afford relief.

Accumulated surpluses are not taxed in this bill. Some folks inadvertently have said it is a tax upon surplus or it is a tax upon undistributed income. This is not correct. It is a tax upon the adjusted net income. We are using the undistributed net income, or the distributed net income, if you please, as the yardstick to determine the corporate tax.

Under existing law, you have gross income and you work from gross income down to your net income. You take off the debts, operating expenses, losses, depreciation, depletion, interest, and a dozen and one other things. The method of computing your tax is not changed in this bill, except we are adding the intercorporate dividends to the gross income.

DEPRECIATION AND DEPLETION

Between the years 1926 and 1930, the official records show that there were written off for depreciation and depletion 16.2 billion dollars; that between the 4 years next following, 1930–33, there was written off in depreciation and depletion 16.4 billion dollars; that for this last period of 4 years, 1930–33, the amount written off and deducted from gross income for depreciation and depletion was 49.9 percent of the net income of the corporate taxpayers; in other words, depreciation and depletion were practically one-half of the net income upon which they paid tax.

So, I say we are not disturbing the present system of computing the tax. We provide schedules 1, 2, and 3, which we think prefer the small income corporations to the larger income corporations, but we did not stop there. We recognized that there were certain corporations that were in a particular field that could not declare dividends. Under the philosophy of this bill, declaring cut dividends means a reduction in the tax. We thought that if your corporations could not declare cut dividends, they should not pay the maximum rates.

The plan suggested for these relief provisions is to impose the tax of 22½ percent upon the amount that may be used under the law. Then, the adjusted net income is to be reduced by the sum of the tax and the amount to which the relief rates were applied. With this new base, then, the general plan is followed. Sections 14, 15, and 16 are the applicable sections to the particular relief provisions to which we have just referred.

SECTION 14

Section 14 permits the imposition of a 22½-percent rate upon such amount as represents the difference between the adjusted net income and the accumulated earnings and profits (computed without diminution by reason of the distribution during the taxable year of earnings and profits, or by reason of the taxes imposed by this title for the taxable year).

To illustrate its application. Say the adjusted net income for the year is $100 and the accumulated earnings and profits are $80—it is apparent that there is a deficit of $20 which, if paid out, is not taxable in the hands of the individual shareholder, since it is a distribution of capital. The amount that makes up this deficit, $20, takes the relief rate of 22½ percent, or a tax of $4.50. The new tax base is the difference between $100 and the sum of $4.50 (the tax) and $20, or $24.50. The new base is $75.50. If this is all distributed the corporation will have paid a tax upon its adjusted net income of 4½ percent. Personally, I am inclined to the notion that the 20 percent, representing capital replacement, should not be deducted from the taxable base of the owner in arriving at capital gain from sale or liquidation, or the rate should be the same as receivership, 15 percent for that part that goes to make up deficit.

This section also meets the many cases where dividends cannot be paid out while a capital deficit exists. Many of the States have provisions to such effect, and we have reduced the rate of tax upon such sums that cannot be declared out as distribution of income from 29½ to 22½ percent.

Section 15 deals with cases, and there are many of them, where there has been a written agreement executed prior to March 3, 1936, not to pay out dividends until the provisions of the contract have been complied with.

Moneys are obtained upon expressed promises that dividends will not be declared until the loan and interest is repaid in whole or in part. The committee recognizes the position in which the taxpayer is placed and we have reduced the maximum rate applicable in cases of this kind from 29½ percent to 22½ percent. In these cases any part, or all, of the adjusted net income may be used up under this provision. If the entire amount does not come within the provisions of the contract, the total adjusted net income is reduced by the amount that comes under the contract plus the tax thereon, and the new base comes under the general plan. It should be stated that in sections 14 and 15 recognition is taken of State laws, written contracts, and the general principle dealing with nontaxation of return of capital. There may be some discussion as to the rate that should be imposed. Some would maintain that the relief rate should be a lesser figure than 22½ percent, but certainly no one will condemn with fairness the principles involved in these two sections.

SECTION 16—DEBTS

The major opposition presented by witnesses during the hearing was the penalization of corporations for paying their debts. I hardly think that such criticism is really fair, especially when considering the manner in which it was given, because under existing law there is a penalty upon moneys that go toward the payment of debts. Under existing law approximately 16.4 percent must be deducted from the adjusted net income even if every dollar of the remainder goes toward the payment of debts. We have made provisions for the taxpayer to amortize debts as defined in this paragraph over such period of years as he may desire, but not less than 5 years, and to permit the application of the 22½-percent rate to such sums. As an illustration: The taxpayer determines how he will treat his debt structure in connection with taxes. Assume that the debts total $100,000 and that he wants to amortize them over a period of 5 years. In each of his returns for the next 5 years the taxpayer may use $20,000 of the adjusted net income at the 22½-percent rate and then reduce such adjusted net income by the sum of $20,000 plus the tax of $4,500, resulting in a new base of $75,500. If he desired to retain 30 percent of his new adjusted net income, the tax on the remainder would be $11,325. The total tax would be $15,825, or about 15.825 percent on the total adjusted net income.

We must keep in mind that under the philosophy of this bill all dividends distributed by the corporation pay no tax. Now, there will be many corporations that will pay no tax. That money will be paid into the hands of individual income-tax payers, and certainly they are going to be happy to get that income and they will have income with which to pay the tax.

If there is a complete distribution, it is estimated that you will have $4,800,000,000 additional paid to the individual shareholders in this country. If you have 70-percent distribution to the stockholders, it is estimated that there will be paid to those shareholders $3,360,000,000 more dollars.

If every dollar of the additional $620,000,000 in tax were to be paid by the individual shareholders, they would still have in their treasury the difference between $3,360,000,000 and the $620,000,000, or $2,740,000,000.

A COUNTER PROPOSAL

A very distinguished member of the committee on our side of the House was very strong in his denunciation of this tax program. He claims that undue tax burdens will be placed upon industry in this country if this bill goes into effect. We were told that it would require an increase in the corporate tax to 25½ percent to bring in the yield this bill would bring in. That is a flat rate—no preferred rates nor exemptions for crippled companies. Yet my friend from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK] actually moved the adoption of a 22½-percent flat rate on corporations, the retention of the capital-stock and excess-profits tax. I respectfully submit that industry and particularly crippled industry would be much worse off under such a plan.

I do not quite get the viewpoint of my friend. Under this bill corporations per se will pay less tax, but the owners of the corporation who would pay whether it came out of the corporate treasury or out of their own individual treasury, will pay more because they will receive more income. I have not heard of any shareholders objecting to this bill on the ground that they would pay more individual income tax.

TREATMENT OF DEBTS

In regard to debts, I do not know whether our treatment of the debt situation is all that it should be or not. I know it was the best that we could do under the situation, taking into consideration the time element and everything else. Here is what we do. We define debts. We do not include as debt any money that has been borrowed for operating expenses. That may not suit some folks. The theory of that is that if you borrow money to buy inventory, when you sell your stock the money you borrowed to purchase the inventory comes back to you. What we have done is to freeze debts as of March 3, 1936. The first class of debts brought in this division are debts, bond issues, contracts to pay, where the maturity date is more than 3 years beyond the date of its execution; and, secondly, bewhiskered debts, debts that were created at least 3 years next before March 3, 1936, and exist in original form or have been renewed from time to time. We include the paper that represents that debt as sufficient to bring it under this particular class. This cares for renewals. Then we say that debts embracing moneys that went into capital assets are to be considered under this relief provision. I say to the membership of this House, and the hearings will bear me out, that the major objection directed to the proposed plan grew out of the treatment of debts, and particularly money that had gone into capital assets, which would include plant extensions and things of that kind.

The first time the taxpayer makes a return he will set out what debts he has that come under this provision. Then he has the option of determining the period that he will take to amortize those debts under this 22½-percent plan. Let us assume that the debts aggregate $300,000. He can take 5 years. He cannot take less than 5 years, but he can take 5 years or 10 years or 20 years. All you have to do, if it is a 5-year proposition, is to divide your $300,000 by five, and that means that you can take $60,000 of your adjusted net income and apply it to the debt at the 22½-percent rate and as I pointed out a short time ago, if the other money is distributed, the corporation tax will be 22½ percent of the amount that goes to debt, instead of 22½ percent of the adjusted net income. Then you deduct the amount that goes to debt with tax, and you have a new base for the purpose of calculating the remainder of the tax. Further, the taxpayer does not have to take this money and apply it on the debt. He can take the money and put it wherever he wants to put it.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I am sorry, but I cannot yield at this time. One other major criticism which has been directed at this bill is that it would impair the surplus, and the working capital of the corporation. I say frankly that if I thought this bill would do this I would not be for it. I made the effort to secure fair treatment for corporations that have their capital impaired.

AGAIN—CUSHIONS

The fact is that our critics do not understand the mechanics of this bill. They have not tried to realize the philosophy of the bill or the mechanics of the bill. If 42 percent of adjusted net income, which is 12 percent more than the average for the past 10 years, or 17 percent more than the average for past 15 years of moneys retained to surplus, can go to surplus for the same tax they are paying now, is that a real hardship? You understand corporations pay this capital-stock tax and excess-profits tax now, regardless of whether they are in receivership, whether they have a capital deficit, and regardless of a contract not to pay dividends, or regardless of their debt structure. They pay that amount now. When 42 percent can go to reserves I submit that that in itself is a real cushion. On the larger corporations, when 31.9 percent can be retained for the same tax they are paying now, that is a real cushion. That is not all that the corporations have. They have the ability to retain 100 percent without paying this maximum rate, either 29½ or 42½ percent. Why do I say that? I say it because it is a fact. Out of the 214,000 small corporations, those with net incomes less than $10,000, how many of them are closely held? How many of them started out as individuals or partnerships in business and then, seeking to get advantage of the corporate entity, of which I have no criticism, they formed a corporation?

A splendid gentleman from Mount Vernon, Ohio, appeared before the committee. He was in the bridge-building business. He was very much disturbed about the bill. He kept talking about this 42½-percent rate. Under his set-up it looked like it would be a tremendous burden. This man impressed me as being a high-class gentleman. I believe his name was Mr. Conley. Finally I asked him about his corporate set-up. He said there were several corporate shareholders. I said, "What kind?" He said, "Common and preferred." I said, "How many are preferred and how many are common?" It developed there were only six people who owned common stock. Of course, salaries had been paid to each of them, I think $36,000 a year for several years. There were six shareholders of common stock. That corporation could declare in dividends 100 percent and pay no corporate tax whatever. It would go into the hands of the six common-stock holders, the owners of the common stock. It would be divided up in their hands. Whether or not they reached the high surtax brackets depended upon income from other sources. There is nothing in this law that would prevent these owners of the common stock, if they wanted this money to be retained by the corporation, after they pay the tax upon the dividends, to buy new stock in the corporation, to buy bonds of the corporation, or to loan it on a plain note of hand, as we say in Kentucky, to the corporation.

You would have identically the same amount of money, less the tax, in the working capital of the corporation, and they would never reach 29½ percent, or 42½ percent, or any other rate. There would be no corporate tax.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In just a moment. Now take the large corporation with the larger number of stockholders, the broader spread. I think, possibly, what the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has in mind was the larger corporation. What do they do now? They sell stock rights. They pay out dividends. They sell stock rights. They sell stock in their corporation. They may issue preferred stock for dividends. They may pay dividends in bonds. They may declare dividends and give an option to buy stock. There are any one of a half dozen legal ways of doing it. The gentleman from New York the other day thought it might be evasion or avoiding the tax. It is not at all. The point is that the earnings, the net income, the income intended by the people of this Nation when they adopted this income-tax amendment, is subject to tax by the Federal Government.

I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Referring to the illustration which the gentleman gave a moment ago, using the corporation closely held, with only six shareholders, as I understand, the gentleman states that if that corporation distributed 100 percent of its adjusted net income into the hands of the six shareholders and held none of it for surplus, that the situation can be retrieved for the corporation or the situation balanced by those six shareholders lending money back to the corporation, less the tax that they have paid as individual income-tax payers. Is the analogy correct? If they loan the money back to the corporation, it is not the corporation's money. It is the corporation's debt.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is right, and they pay interest on that debt, but they do not pay 29½ percent and they do not pay 42½ percent. That is the point. The gentleman was much concerned about maximum rates. That is all we hear about from the opponents—maximum rates. I say to you that the maximum rates will not attach, will not apply, except in the unusual case. They pay interest on the debts. Yes. What happens? Next year, when they make their income-tax returns they deduct the interest charge on that debt as a part of the deductible items before they arrive at the net income upon which they pay taxes.

Between 1921 and 1930 the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. paid to its stockholders $854,000,000 in dividends. During this same period they collected back from these same stockholders $958,000,000 through the sale of stock rights. In other words, in this 10-year period they recovered into their treasury $104,000,000 more than they declared out in stock dividends. This is the reason we do not hear opposition coming from the real operating companies.

Oh, yes; friends came down here representing the United States Chamber of Commerce. God bless them! I should like to see some legislation sometime that would suit them. We thought we were suiting them in the reciprocal-trade agreements. We wrote the bill in conformity with one of their resolutions. Despite that, they came down and endeavored to have it done thus and so.

The distinguished chairman of our committee in the opening address in this debate referred to the United States Chamber of Commerce representing small business crying against this bill because it tended toward monopoly. I ask you what crowd other than the crowd that met as the finance committee of the Chamber of Commerce would grasp more kindly, more quickly an effort that would tend toward monopoly?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky may proceed for an additional 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ROBERTSON). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. GEHRMANN. In my district I have some of the largest cooperatives in the country, for instance, the Northern States Cooperative League. They are worried as to whether they are exempt from the provisions of this bill.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Are they exempt under section 101 of the income-tax laws?

Mr. GEHRMANN. They so state.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Then they are exempt under this bill?

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman from Ohio the other day made some observations that disturbed me quite a bit. He said there was a provision in the bill that might have a tendency to drive out of business the small packer who, because of the unjust-enrichment tax would have to pay back that which he has not got.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I should like to know, even with all the ingenuity of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK], just how they are going to collect an income tax on something the taxpayer has not received.

In the first place, the "windfall" tax if it is absorbed—and the gentlemen to whom my friend from Ohio referred all claimed that it was absorbed by them; that because of the competitive condition they could not pass it on, that they never passed it on; if it was absorbed they pay no tax; and, even if it was not absorbed, under the provisions of this bill they must have a net income for that part of the business that deals with the commodities upon which they have collected the tax but have not paid it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. ASHBROOK. The gentleman is discussing a portion of this tax bill in which I am very much interested. I wish the gentleman would tell me whether or not a company that has received a refund of processing taxes from the Government will be subject to this tax when it has operated at a loss.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Is the company engaging in one business or in many businesses?

Mr. ASHBROOK. It is engaged in one business.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Is this business concern one of the pork packers?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Yes; it is one of the pork packers.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And it does nothing else?

Mr. ASHBROOK. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And they made no net income?

Mr. ASHBROOK. They have no income.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. They pay no tax.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Is the gentleman absolutely certain of that?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is my understanding. I am just as certain of that as I am of anything.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. There is absolutely no question about that.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. BIERMANN. Is there anything to the accusation that this corporation tax will discourage a company from investing in new equipment and expanding its plant? How is this feature treated in the bill?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If they need more than the surplus left them under all the provisions of the bill the tax might be somewhat larger.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I suggest the gentleman call attention to the provision for reserves, depreciation, depletion, and so forth.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes. Take, for instance, depreciation. We found back of 1934 that some were taking more than 100 percent. When we realize that 49.9 of the statutory net income of corporations over the period from 1930 to 1933 is represented in allowances and deductions for depreciation and depletion, that is a pretty fair indication.

The bill contains language relating to complete liquidation which is going to bring in several millions of dollars and which, I think, is a very fair provision. I hope to discuss it more fully.

STOCK DIVIDENDS

Coming now to stock dividends, this is a field that has more or less been surrounded with mystery. Existing law provides that no tax shall be levied upon stock dividends. We strike that from this bill. There are innumerable types of stock dividends that are taxable under the Constitution and under the celebrated case of Eisner versus Macomber.

The kind of securities issued and the change in the proportion of ownership of a person in a corporation are the determining factors as to whether or not it is taxable income under the sixteenth amendment. I am surprised that our friends on the minority have not been saying that we are trying to undermine the Constitution of the United States when we attempt to tax stock dividends. There are many stock dividends that are taxable.

It is our purpose to allow as a dividend credit distribution in stock of corporations, or in rights to acquire stock of a corporation which constitutes income to the shareholder within the meaning of the sixteenth amendment. In no sense is this is an attack upon the Eisner against Macomber decision. There are many dividends received in stock and stock rights that are distinguishable from the character of stock dividend in the Macomber case, supra, and are actual realized taxable income.

As we see it, a stock dividend that is not taxable is one in which the relative interest of each shareholder of a corporation is unchanged in his stock ownership. The Supreme Court, in the Macomber cases, uses this language:

A stock dividend, evidencing merely a transfer of an accumulated surplus to the capital account of the corporation, takes nothing from the property of the corporation and adds nothing to that of the shareholder; a tax on such dividends is a tax on capital increase and not on income, and to be valid under the Constitution such taxes must be apportioned according to population.

There are however many instances in which dividends in stocks or bonds are issued which are realized taxable incomes under the 16th amendment. The yardstick of ownership in many cases is changed—that is, the relative proportion of ownership in the corporation by a shareholder is increased or decreased.

With permission of the chairman, I insert herewith memorandum furnished me by Mr. Kent, Acting General Counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue:

Reference is made to the request of Representative VINSON for a compilation of cases involving the taxability as income of stock dividends.

In the following cases the stock dividends or rights received were considered a mere change of form and not the realization of income and, therefore, were not taxable.

Towne v. Eisner (245 U. S. 418).

Eisner v. Macomber (252 U. S. 189).

Miles v. Safe Deposit & Trust Co. of Baltimore (259 U. S. 247, aff'g. 273 Fed. 822).

George T. Smith v. Commissioner (21 B. T. A. 782).

T. I. Hare Powel v. Commissioner (27 B. T. A. 55).

In the following cases the dividends received were distinguished from stock dividends and could, therefore, be treated as realized, taxable income.

Peabody v. Eisner (247 U. S. 347) (dividend of preferred and common stock of a different corporation).

Doerschuck v. United States (274 U. S. 739) (dividend of debenture bonds of the same corporation).

Vogt Machine Co. v. United States (39 Fed. (2d) 986, certiorari denied, 282 U. S. 861). (Company declared cash dividend, bearing interest at 4 percent, to be paid 6 and 12 months thereafter in stock to be issued.)

United States v. Fuller (42 Fed. (2d) 471). (Dividend of the corporation's own bonds.)

Tillotson Manufacturing Co. v. Commissioner (76 Fed. (2d) 189, affirming 27 B. T. A. 913). (Accrued dividends on preferred stock paid in common stock of the corporation, some preferred-stock holders, however, accepting cash instead.)

Eugene E. Paul et al. v. Commissioner (2 B. T. A. 150). (Cash dividend declared. Six days later new stock issue was authorized, and stockholders agreed that dividend checks would be used to purchase the newly issued common and preferred stock.)

W. J. Hunt v. Commissioner (5 B. T. A. 356). (Prior to declaration of cash dividends, stockholders agreed among themselves to apply checks toward purchase of previously issued stock.)

Luthe Hardware Co. v. Commissioner (6 B. T. A. 53). (Cash dividend declared, but holders of 294 out of 300 shares held checks until new stock was issued and then endorsed checks over for purchase of new shares.)

J. E. Brading v. Commissioner (17 B. T. A. 429). (New stock issued to stockholders of close corporation after passage of resolution that debt thus incurred was to be liquidated by application of dividends due, or to become due, or as the board of directors might direct. A dividend was then declared and applied toward payment of the price of the new stock.)

Margaret B. Payne v. Commissioner (19 B. T. A. 1305). (Cash dividend was declared, and checks were issued, but, in accordance with previous agreement among stockholders that this dividend was to be treated as a stock dividend, the stockholders used it to purchase a new issue of stock.)

Joseph Paper v. Commissioner (29 B. T. A. 523). (Resolution gave stockholders option to take dividends in cash or in preferred stock.)

L. Elmer Wood et al. v. Commissioner (29 B. T. A. 731). (Resolution provided that accrued dividends on 6-percent preferred stock should be paid from net earnings, but preferred-stock holders were given opportunity to use dividends for purchase of entire new issue of 7-percent preferred.)

May I say also that a professor has recently written a very splendid article upon the taxability of stock income—and, by the way, this comes from Columbia University. I want to say that there is not a single Member on the Republican side of this House who will not bear witness with me that Roswell Magill is an authority upon taxation. Even though he is a professor, he is a sound professor, a sound student, and a real teacher in the field of taxation. If they try to back up on this I shall get some of the speeches which have been made by them praising Professor Magill, and properly so. This splendid article appears in the April 1936 volume of the Columbia University Law Review.

BANKS AND TRUST COMPANIES

Under section 104, a rate of 15 percent of the amount of net income of banks is imposed. A bank is defined as a bank or trust company incorporated under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory, a substantial part of whose business is the receipt of deposits and the making of loans and discounts.

The argument has been used that because we make a flat rate for such corporations, that it is an admission that surplus should be permitted to be built up without restrictions. However, banks and trust companies occupy a peculiar situation in our economic structure. They are under supervision of either the State or Federal Government. They are required by law and by regulations to maintain certain reserves and because of such restrictions they are unable to pay out dividends and consequently they would be injured if they were subjected to the maximum rate.

Again if they were to pay out in dividends their earnings and profits, it might be only the next day thereafter the bank inspector, either State or Federal, would require them to strengthen their financial structure in assessments upon the stockholders involved.

There is another angle to it—the deposits in most of the banks of the country are insured, and it is thought necessary not only for the benefit of the depositors and stockholders, but for the Government as well, that the reserves provided for by law and regulations be securely and strictly maintained.

CORPORATIONS IN RECEIVERSHIP

Such corporations carry a 15-percent flat rate. It is evident that being in receivership that they are not under the control of their directorate but are answerable to the court for its management. Most corporations coming in this category cannot pay out dividends even if they desired to do so. Consequently we have imposed a flat rate of 15 percent applicable to such corporations.

DIVIDEND CARRY-OVER

In order that the taxpayer would receive credit in full for dividends paid, we have provided in this bill that if the dividends declared in any subsequent year is more than the adjusted net income of such year that they can carry over into such taxable year any excess in dividend over the adjusted net income of either one of the 2 years preceding the taxable year involved and use such excess dividends as a dividend credit for such taxable year.

THE USE OF THE MONEY

Mr. Chairman, this permanent money, $620,000,000, under the President's message is for specific purposes. Five hundred million dollars is for the soil-conservation program, and $120,000,000 for 9 years for the soldiers' bonus. Personally, I take issue with the figure $120,000,000, but we passed over the President's veto a bill which provided for the payment of the veterans' adjusted-compensation certificates. We also passed in this session of Congress a soil-conservation bill for the farmers. I find when it comes to voting on the veterans' bill that 67 of my minority friends voted for the cash payment with 31 against. Two-thirds of them voted for cash payment. They thought it was right. I thought it was right, and I still think it is right. When it comes to soil conservation, however, 18 of them voted for the Soil Conservation Act and 72 voted against. But it takes money to pay the bill, and the $620,000,000 involved herein is for these two specific purposes.

THE AMOUNT OF YIELD

The statement is made that this bill will not yield the money. If it will not yield the money, it will not harm business, as some of our friends may think. I know how they got that idea of fear. It is complex, and I do not blame them particularly. I probably would evidence more of it than you do if it were a campaign year and I was out groping for an issue. I probably would be afraid of anything and everything. We had it here when the reciprocal-trade agreements were up. We heard the cry then that that act would drive the small businessmen out of business. They have even misquoted Secretary Wallace in this idea of driving out business.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in our service on the Ways and Means Committee there has been no individual in our recollection who suffers one added copper cent as an additional tax burden, or even if he anticipates that there is a chance that he might pay an additional copper cent who favored any new revenue bill. It is the natural thing for them to slap it—fight back on anything that might tend toward an increase in their tax burden. I do not want to be critical of that attitude, it is a natural one. It may be that membership on the Ways and Means Committee creates a callousness relative to the attitude of people toward legislation. I recall distinctly that in 1932 the automobile people made a most strenuous effort to avoid the imposition of a small excise tax levy upon the sale of automobiles and automobile parts. They stated that it would ruin their business—that it would drive them out of business. Yet we saw the automobile industry lead the way toward industrial recovery. The most mournful pleas to which I have ever listened fell from the lips of witnesses before the committee and Members of the House in opposition to the reciprocal-trade agreement, and, after its enactment, each time there would be an agreement with some foreign country, and before it was announced, Members of the House would cry anew at the injury sustained. They were jumping before they were hit—they were dodging before they were struck and yet, just a few days ago, the United States Chamber of Commerce in its annual report was forced to admit that the benefits to American industry and the American producer through these reciprocal-trade agreements were of material benefit. Reading from this report we see:

Exports of manufacturers and crude materials improve.
Unmanufactured cotton in renewed demand abroad.
Automotive products constituted tenth of export trade.
Machinery exports up 20 percent.
Iron and steel scrap exports set record.
Petroleum exports record new high.
Foreign purchases of chemicals increase.
Demand for American fruits increases.

I insert at this point a summary of this report by the Associated Press.

[From the Washington Star of Apr. 23, 1936]

GAIN IN EXPORTS IN 1935 IS REPORTED—WIDE RANGE OF PRODUCTS COVERED IN LIST OF TRADE BODY

An upward swing in American exports of a wide range of products during 1935 was reported today by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

An analysis by the chamber's foreign commerce section said the "continued, though not spectacular", improvement was "coincident with general recovery, and increased purchasing power in many parts of the world."

Topping the list of products for which increased world demand was reported were cotton, automobiles, machinery, and petroleum products.

"Our export trade was still hampered by quotas, exchange controls, and other important restrictions", the review said. "In some nations these and other efforts to build up self-sufficiency, particularly in products of the soil, limited our trade."

RESTRICTIONS REMOVED

"Our Government's reciprocal trade agreements policy, however, has been removing some of these restrictions", the report added.

Measured by value, 68 percent of 100 leading exports showed increases over 1934, and 56 percent gained over the 5-year average, 1930-34.

Measured by quantity, 63 percent of 167 chief exports gained over the previous year and 59 percent were larger than the 5-year average.

Unmanufactured cotton exports, the review said, "made a strong come-back" in the second half of 1935. A 39-percent increase in shipments was recorded for that period after a 29.1-percent drop in the quantity exported up to the end of June. In the final quarter of the year the gain was called "even more striking"—63 percent over the same period in 1934.

Total cotton exports for the year amounted to 3,234,000,000 pounds, 2.7 percent greater than in 1934, but 17.6 percent below the 5-year average.

ELEVEN PERCENT OF CARS EXPORTED

"Eleven percent of all the passenger automobiles produced in this country in 1935, and 24 percent of our motor truck and bus production were exported, concrete evidence of the importance of foreign trade to the automotive industry", the analysis said.

The export of 173,681 passenger cars was described as higher than for any year since 1929 and 19.7 percent higher than in 1934. Trucks and busses exported totaled 99,080 units, also the high mark since 1929.

Machinery exports topped last year's figure by 20 percent, while iron and steel products, including scrap, were exported in greater quantities than in the 17 years since the World War.

A new high record was reported in the export of crude petroleum, 51,430,000 barrels of which were shipped, 66.6 percent higher than the five-year average.

FURTHER, WITH REFERENCE TO YIELD

It is a hard matter to keep up with the critics in regard to this item. In one breath they say the tax is going to be so onerous and burdensome that our corporate system will be undermined and destroyed. In the next breath they say that because of the provisions of the bill that corporations will pay less tax, that individuals will pay a little more, and that the revenue purposes of the bill fail. Now, these two things simply cannot be. The revenue philosophy underlying this bill is to get a fair tax upon the income permitted to be taxed under the sixteenth amendment. That is all there is to it. The President's message came to us on March 3, 1936. The estimates of yield under this bill made prior to March 15, 1936, necessarily had to be based upon estimates for the taxable year 1935 and likewise 1936. The critics were possessed of the net income figures for 1933, which was the latest available public figures at that time. The Treasury experts in their estimates had an advantage of having the 1934 figures available to them, but at the time of making these estimates they did not have the figures for 1935 running through March 15, which is the main tax pay day. I looked with some concern on the estimates when they first came to us. I compared the net income with the latest figures available to us, which were 1933, but, as I say, the Treasury experts had the 1934 figures available to them. My attention was called to that, but I still doubted that the 1935 yield would square with the estimates, but when March 15 arrived we learned that the figures used by the Treasury experts in their estimates of return under the proposed plan were conservative and that their figures and estimates were nine-tenths of 1 percent under, or in dollars, $9,200,000. I insert herewith table showing the situation as it existed on March 21, 1936:

Receipts from income taxes

[Amounts in millions of dollars]

Actual receipts		Estimated receipts July 1, 1935, to Mar. 21, 1936	Increase, fiscal year 1936 over fiscal year 1935 through Mar. 21		Increase actual receipts over estimated, fiscal year 1936 through Mar. 21
July 1, 1934, to Mar. 21, 1935	July 1, 1935, to Mar. 21, 1936		Amount	Percent	Amount	Percent
760.8	1,002.3	993.1	241.5	31.7	9.2	0.9

You can see at a glance that for the comparable period beginning March 21, 1935, the actual income-tax receipts were $760,800,000; for the comparable period ending March 21, 1936, the Treasury experts' estimate was $993,100,000, whereas, in fact, for this return period they actually collected $1,002,300,000. The increase was $241,500,000 over the same period in the preceding year and $9,200,000 under the Treasury estimates.

Consequently there is only left the taxable year of 1936 for estimates, and all agree that under present business conditions that the estimated yield is conservative. As a matter of fact, statements made on the floor in regard to the yield, I am inclined to think, are merely echoes of the first impressions. Many of the more able critics now agree that the estimates are conservative, which group includes, so I am informed, the experts of the United States Chamber of Commerce. At this point we include the estimate of taxable base and revenues for the calendar year 1936, showing net income, and so forth:

ESTIMATED REVENUE UNDER PROPOSAL TO TAX UNDISTRIBUTED CORPORATE PROFITS

It is estimated that if a tax on undistributed corporate profits was imposed, accompanied by the repeal of the present corporate income, capital-stock, and excess-profits taxes, and the elimination of the present exemption of dividends from normal tax, the net increase in revenue based on calendar year 1936 incomes would be about $620,000,000. The following table summarizes the basic data underlying this estimated increase:

Estimate of taxable base and revenue, calendar year 1936—Corporations showing net income

[In millions of dollars]

1. Statutory net income	7,200
2. Taxes included in (1) to be repealed:
Capital-stock tax	[1] 103
Excess-profits tax	5
3. Dividends received not included in (1), 90 percent of total dividends received	1,000
4. Aggregate taxable income	8,308
5. Cash dividends paid	3,540
6. Withheld earnings, (4) less (5)	4,768
7. Estimated tax on (6), assuming distribution to individuals, plus normal tax on present dividends	1,752
8. Loss in revenue from repeal of corporate income, capital-stock, and excess-profits taxes	1,132
9. Net increase in revenue	620

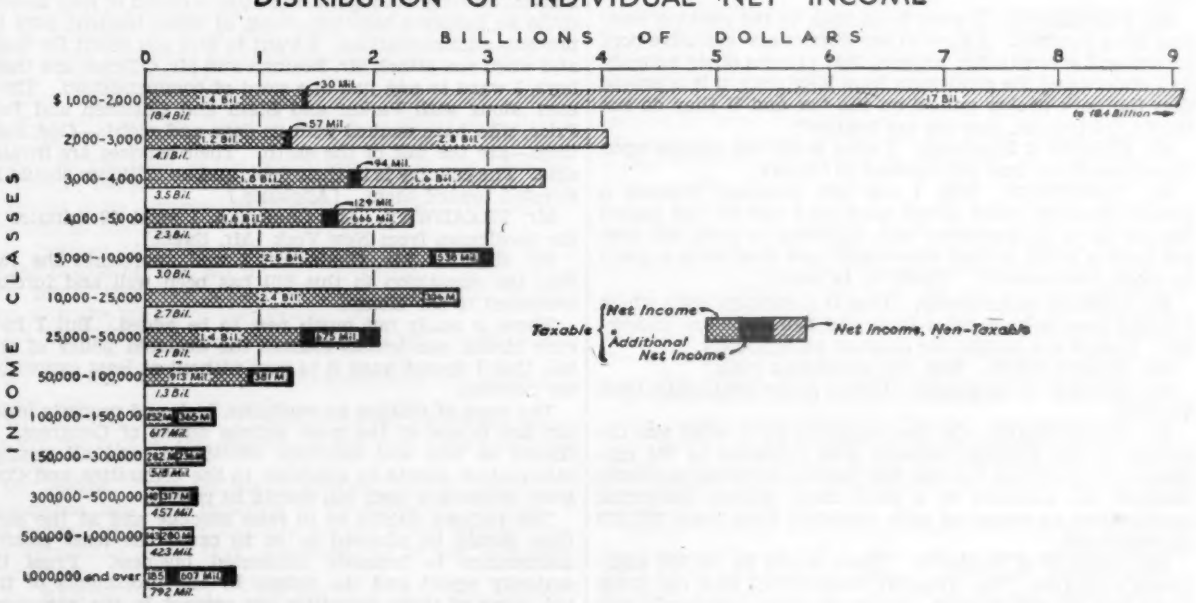
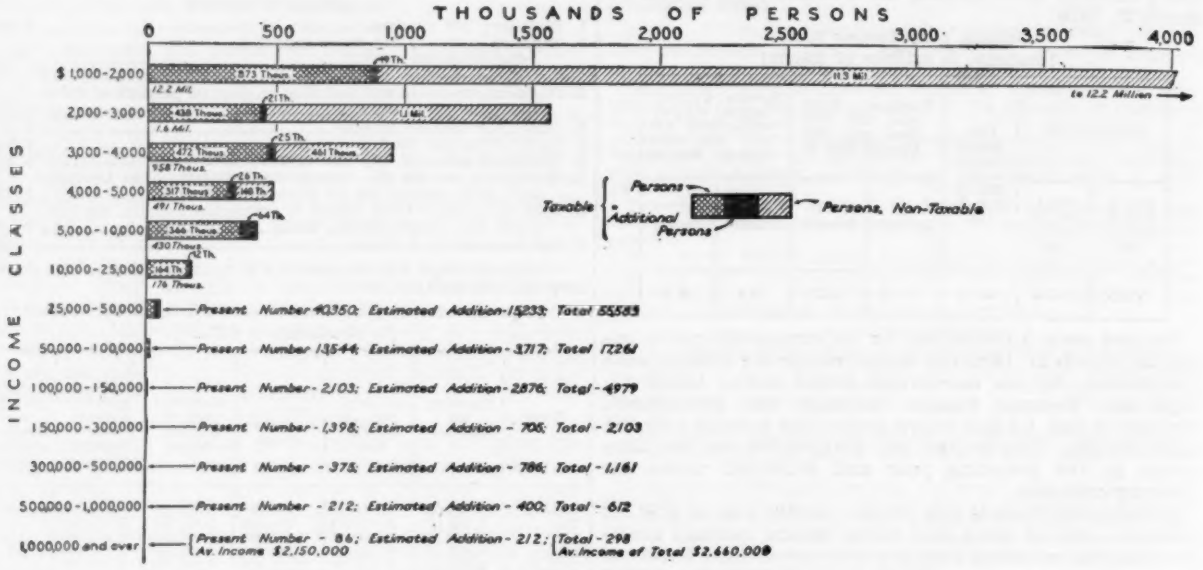
[1] Estimated.

It is fair to say that this estimate was made prior to the writing of the bill, but with certain increased revenues the net increase in revenue is $591,000,000, to which might be added increased revenues from other provisions of the bill.

At this point I want to insert charts showing distribution of individual net income and the number of individuals in each class.



NUMBER OF INDIVIDUALS IN EACH CLASS



*Estimated increases if all corporate earnings were distributed

Note: In income classes less than $5000 only, there are additional non-taxable persons or net income which are not shown.

This shows that there are 2,687,768 taxable under existing law, and that there will be added to the taxpayers' list 191,302 persons. You will note that Mr. McLEOD estimates that the total tax from individual incomes and corporate incomes, capital-stock tax, and excess-profits tax will yield $2,285,000,000 for the calendar year 1936. This is exclusive of $40,000,000 estimated to be recovered into the Treasury under the amendment in the law relating to complete liquidation and increase in taxes received from foreign corporations and nonresident aliens.

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FIESINGER. I want to go back to the packing business for a moment. I have in my district one exclusive pork packer and several other packers that process other animals. As I understand the gentleman from Kentucky, if it is proved that the pork packer passed on the tax and if they do not show a net income, they are not taxable?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I refer to the net income upon the commodities that are involved in the tax.

Mr. FIESINGER. May I ask this question: Suppose a packer processes other things than pork and he has passed the tax on to his consumer with reference to pork, but does not show a profit in that department and does show a profit in other departments? Would he be taxed?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is a question upon which I would have to have other facts and figures before answering. I could not answer the question categorically.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. On the subject of yield, what was the opinion of the Treasury experts with reference to the mechanics of collecting the tax and tracing dividend payments through the accounts of a good many million individual stockholders as compared with collecting from some 250,000 corporations?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. There would be 191,000 additional taxpayers. The Treasury Department does not think there will be any trouble. Some of these individuals will pay no tax at all. Some of them will have exemptions which will wipe out the dividends entirely; others will go into the higher surtax brackets.

CONCLUSION

Just one word in conclusion. We have been criticized because we used the legislative counsel and the experts of the joint committee. I want to plead guilty to that charge. We have done what has been done here since you have had a legislative counsel, which is our drafting service, and a joint committee. We agreed in subcommittee and made recommendations to the full committee. Hearings were held and the recommendations of the subcommittee were considered. We determined the policy and turned the matter over from a manual drafting standpoint to as fine a crowd of men as ever could be gathered together—most of them brought here by previous administrations. I want to give you credit for that; and when you attack Mr. Beaman and Mr. O'Brien and those boys, I want to add just one word of commendation. These men, along with Parker and Stam and Chesteen and Pete Price, who have worked with us days and nights—God bless them—are the salt of the earth. Their services are invaluable. The country is in their debt, and no criticism should be directed toward them. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I well appreciate the fact that the opposition to this bill has been well and forcibly presented to the House.

There is really not much new to be added. But I have such strong convictions against the declared policy of this bill, that I do not want it to pass without at least expressing my position.

The work of making an equitable, just, and properly levied tax law is one of the most serious duties of Congress. It should be well and carefully considered, and all possible information should be available to the committee and Congress before any such bill should be passed.

The purpose should be to raise revenue and at the same time should be planned so as to cause the least possible disturbance to honestly conducted business. From the majority report and the debate by the proponents of this bill, none of these essentials are present in the consideration of this bill. The only real proponent of the bill, besides the Government officials—and they were conspicuously lacking in detailed information, and especially in the one particular they were supposed to be informed, the amount of money it would raise—was a representative of the Communist Party. This alone should raise a question of doubt in minds of most of the Members. And when I read a statement said to come from the Member most active in its preparation that he was not informed as to the exact amount of revenue the bill would produce, and when I read in the majority report that probably the next Congress would be in position to pass more intelligently on a tax measure, I thought that this measure was simply a stopgap bill for election purposes, and I could see no compelling reason for supporting this measure at the present time.

Before beginning my statement, I want to make one or two references to some of the statements made by my good friend from Kentucky. The gentleman opened his remarks by saying that the Republicans, of course, were against the provisions of this bill because they are against all taxes, and to bear him out he read from the minority views on the bill, saying, "I will prove to you that this is so", and then he read from the first section of the minority views, as follows:

We do not favor the imposition of any new taxes.

Now, if the gentleman had really intended to give the House and the country a fair interpretation of the Republican situation in regard to this bill, why did he not read the entire sentence. It is only one and one-half lines long—and I will read it to you:

We do not favor the imposition of any new taxes until the waste of public moneys is stopped.

I do not know that the gentleman from Kentucky intended to give you any false impression, because I well appreciate the fact that the waste of public moneys means nothing to the Democratic administration at the present time, so I absolve him of trying to give a wrong impression.

Furthermore, he said there has been some talk going about the country that the average citizen could not understand this bill. If any argument was needed to convince the average Member of this House, to say nothing of the average citizen of the country, that he could not understand this bill, all that was needed was to hear the plain, lucid, and complete explanation of its workings made by the gentleman from Kentucky. You know that explanation reminded me of trying to figure out how much one will get under a Government retirement old-age plan. You start in by taking the average salary for the last 5 years, divide that by 70, multiply it by 22, then guess at the result. This is about what you would get from his explanation of the workings of the pending bill.

When Congress is writing a tax bill, that is really about as important and far-reaching a piece of business as it ever becomes our duty to perform. All possible information should be available to the committee and to the Congress. Of course, the purpose of a tax bill is to raise revenue, and it should be so arranged as to cause as little disturbance to business as possible.

In reading over the majority report and after listening to the debate on this bill by its proponents, it seems to me very few of these essentials have been presented in connection with the bill up to the present time.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; if I have misrepresented the gentleman in any way.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I think if the gentleman will examine my remarks on this subject, he will find I did give those figures.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman gave out several interesting statements, but I am referring to the statement he gave to the papers the day he introduced the bill in the House. Does the gentleman deny that statement, or is my statement wrong?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I did not have such definite information at that time, but I had it when I made my speech here.

Mr. SNELL. Then the gentleman and I agree that he did not have the information at that time, which is the statement I made.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. We made certain changes in the bill while we were considering it, and of course we added something here and lost something there, and therefore I did not have the definite information at the time the gentleman refers to.

Mr. SNELL. Has the gentleman definite information as to what this bill will produce?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I have the estimates of the Treasury Department, and the gentleman will find them in the remarks I made on Thursday of last week.

Mr. SNELL. I think it is largely a matter of guesswork even at the present time.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Well, we can always depend on Treasury estimates. I think they have never missed it very far.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, the guess is that this bill will produce six hundred to eight hundred millions more than the laws it repeals. But no one actually knows. But before I vote to increase the burden of the taxpayers that amount I want to know it is going to be wisely and economically expended.

There is not a man in this House but knows in his own mind that the present administration is not now spending the taxpayers' money either wisely or economically. There is not a man here who does not know he would not spend his own money in foolish boondoggling and on extravagant and wasteful projects, such as the present administration is now fostering in every community throughout the land.

And I have made up my mind I will not vote for any new taxes for the present administration to waste, throw away, or use for purely political purposes.

Any tax sums necessary for the legitimate expenses of the Government, emergency or ordinary, I will support, but no sober-minded man should vote to levy new taxes on our people to further encourage the extravagant and wasteful spending of the present administration.

Let me review briefly the financial history of the last 3 years. The present session of Congress is the fourth since the inauguration of President Roosevelt. There has been one special session and this is the third regular session. These four Congresses, from March 4, 1933, to date, have actually appropriated out of the funds of the United States Treasury for expenditure by the Federal Government the sum of $27,783,545,000. That amount does not include any appropriation for the 10 regular departments of the Federal Government for their operations during the fiscal year 1937, because all those appropriation bills have not yet been passed by Congress. It does not include the $1,500,000,000 additional money which the President has requested for the relief program for the next fiscal year. It does not include the deficiency appropriation bills which are customarily enacted at each session of Congress to cover items not included in the regular appropriation bills. It does not include the $450,000,000 bill for rural electrification which has passed both the House and the Senate, but is not yet law. It does not include $460,000,000 which the President will need for the social-security law. It does not include the $440,000,000 authorization in the highway bill which the House passed last week, or any other similar bills which authorize appropriations.

A conservative estimate at this time of the appropriations which Congress will make during the remainder of this session amounts to approximately $4,890,000,000. This estimate assumes that there will be no large requests for money by the President and the Government departments beyond those I have just mentioned.

Adding together the appropriations made by the preceding Congresses since March 4, 1933, and by this session, and the estimate of the appropriations to be made during the remainder of this session, we arrive at the round sum of $32,673,500,000.

Translating the total figure of $32,673,500,000, which I gave, into terms of each person in the United States, it means that Congress, under the Roosevelt leadership, has appropriated out of the funds of every man, woman, and child now living in the United States the sum of $254. It means that on the Census Bureau basis of families, the head of each family in the United States has had over $1,011 appropriated out of his funds. This includes every family on relief as as well as the families not on relief. I ask each mother and father to ask themselves this question: "Has it been worth $1,000 of our own money to have Mr. Roosevelt in office for the past 4 years?" Bear in mind the fact that this $1,000 must be paid by you in addition to all other expenses, whatever they may be. In answering this question you should remember that Mr. Roosevelt was the man who said on July 2, 1932:

Well, I know something of taxes. For 3 years I have been going up and down this country preaching that Government—Federal and State and local—costs were too much.

He is the man who said on October 19, 1932:

Taxes are paid in the sweat of every man who labors, because they are a burden on production and can be paid only by production. * * * Our workers may never see a tax bill, but they pay in deductions from wages, in increased cost of what they buy, or (as now) is broad cessation of employment. * * * Our Federal extravagance and improvidence bear a double evil: First, our people and our business cannot carry its excessive burdens of taxes; second, our credit structure is impaired by the unorthodox Federal financing made necessary by the unprecedented magnitude of these deficits.

In that statement he admits the laboring man pays the taxes, yet today you want to increase the laboring man's burden. Furthermore, if any administration in history has had unorthodox financing it is the present one. It has never yet presented to Congress at the beginning of the year a complete picture of the Government's finances. It has always been incomplete and piecemeal. It has never at one time placed the whole picture before us so we could study it and pass on it intelligently. It has always held a part back. It always paints a rosy picture at the beginning of the year. There is no need of taxes, and there are ample funds for everything. Then, just before the close of the session, to the surprise of everyone, in comes a tax bill from the President. There is not a single emergency today that did not exist the day the President sent his Budget message, yet he said again there would be no need of additional taxes, and now he says we need $1,137,000,000 in new taxes.

It all goes to prove beyond any shadow of doubt that the present administration does not have a single semblance of a financial program nor has it had once since it has been in office.

The only program it has is to spend all the money, in as many ways as possible, and then tax the people in every known way to get the money. What it cannot get by taxation it just borrows.

If the present administration would first find out the expected receipts and then govern its expenditures accordingly you would then perhaps have a financial program.

This tax bill is here as the inevitable result of these tremendous appropriations of money by Congress and the resulting expenditures by the executive departments under the personal direction of the President. In 1933 and 1934 President Roosevelt requested, and Congress enacted, a new tax law. In 1935 the President requested, and Congress enacted, a new tax law. Now, in 1936, the President requests the passage of another tax law, and Congress is at present engaged in complying with this request. So for the fourth time in 4 years Congress is at work on a tax law to get more money for Mr. Roosevelt to spend.

One would ordinarily think that with three new tax laws already in operation and a fourth one pending, all of them designed to raise more money, together with increased revenues we hear so much about, the Federal Government ought to be getting enough money to meet its expenses. But the sad truth is that it is not. Let us look into this for a moment because it has a direct bearing on the legislation which we are considering.

For the fiscal year 1934 the gross deficit of the Federal Government; that is to say, the amount by which the Government's expenses exceeded its receipts was $3,989,000,000. For the fiscal year 1935 the gross deficit was $3,575,000,000. These are the President's own figures, taken from his Budget message of January 3, 1936, page VIII. In that message he estimated that the gross deficit for the fiscal year 1936 would be $3,234,000,000. However, this did not include the amount necessary to pay the soldiers' bonus, for which Congress has already appropriated $1,730,000,000. Neither did this include the loss of the revenue from the illegal A. A. A. processing taxes. This means that the gross deficit for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, will amount to at least $5,000,000,000.

Now, the total receipts of the Federal Government for the fiscal year 1936 were estimated at $4,410,793,946 by the President in his message of January 3. This means that the Federal Government in the present fiscal year actually needs more than twice as much revenue as it is getting in order to equal its expenditures. If we omit the soldiers' bonus on the theory that it is a nonrecurring item and it will not have to be paid again, the Government needs 75 percent more revenue than it is getting in order to pay the Roosevelt bills.

Therefore, we find that in spite of the two new tax laws of 1934 and 1935 the Government is nowhere near a balancing of its Budget, and each year that the present administration continues in power, we are getting deeper and deeper in the hole.

Yet it was Mr. Roosevelt who said on July 30, 1932:

Let us have the courage to stop borrowing to meet continuing deficits. Stop the deficits. * * * Revenues must cover expenditures by one means or another. Any government, like any family, can for a year spend a little more than it earns. But you and I know that a continuation of that habit means the poorhouse.

Contrast this statement with the most recent utterance of President Roosevelt. In his speech made at Baltimore, Md., on April 13, 1936, he said:

For the next few months you are going to be thoroughly bored by so-called answers. There are two or three new panaceas in every day's paper. Here is one, picked out at random from three on the same page of one newspaper. The eminent author suggests a four-point cure for all our ills. I hope you will be as thrilled and excited by them as I was. Here they are:

"1. Establish a monetary unit with a definite gold content, subject to change only by Congress.

"2. Restore convertibility of money into gold coin and private ownership of gold.

"3. Accept responsibility as the world's greatest creditor nation.

"4. Put Federal finances in order."

I ask you what do panacea planks like these offer to you as a way out of the problems that you had today and will get up to face tomorrow?

What a strange utterance from a man who flew to Chicago in the summer of 1932 to accept the nomination as the Democratic candidate for President and who said in his acceptance speech:

I propose to you, my friends, and through you, that government of all kinds, big and little, be made solvent and that the example be set by the President of the United States and his Cabinet.

What a remarkable change of attitude in a man who toured the country from one end to the other in 1932, pledging his solemn word to the people that he would reduce the expenses of the Federal Government, that he would balance the Budget, and who asked that he be put in office on the basis of such promises! A solemn promise to the people, which in 1932 was one of the principal reasons urged by Candidate Roosevelt for his election as President, has become in 1936 a panacea which bores President Roosevelt.

Let us trace this remarkable change of attitude through its various stages. In President Roosevelt's Budget message of January 3, 1934, which was 10 months after he had taken the oath of office as President, he said, on page 8:

Furthermore, the Government during the balance of this calendar year should plan to bring its 1936 expenditures, including recovery and relief, within the revenues expected in the fiscal year 1936. * * * We should plan to have a definitely balanced Budget for the third year of recovery and from that time on seek a continuing reduction of the national debt.

The especial aptness of the President in forgetting his promises and pledges to the people in money matters became evident in his Budget message just 1 year later, January 3, 1935. With that message he transmitted the Budget for 1936, which he asked Congress to adopt. Bear in mind that this was the Budget which he had promised 12 months previously would be balanced. He said, on page 13:

If the estimates submitted in this Budget are approved and if the expenditures for which authorization is asked are made in full, the deficit, including statutory debt retirements, will amount to $4,528,000,000 for the fiscal year 1936.

On January 3, 1936, he revised this estimate to make it $3,234,000,000. However, as I have pointed out, the payment of the bonus was not included in the revised figure and actually the deficit for 1936 will approximate $5,000,000,000.

Now let us look at something else the President said on January 3, 1935, in his Budget message for the fiscal year 1936. He said (p. 10):

If this Budget receives the approval of the Congress, the country will henceforth have the assurance that, with the single exception of this item—

Referring to unemployment relief—

every current expenditure of whatever nature will be fully covered by our estimates of current receipts.

One year later, on January 3, 1936, he said in submitting the Budget for 1937:

The gross deficit for the fiscal year 1937 is estimated at $1,098,388,720. * * * The figure for 1937 does not include such amounts for work relief during the coming year as may be determined upon by the Congress.

In other words, the President had again failed to fulfill a positive assurance made to the country 1 year previously that he would balance the Budget for 1937. Perhaps it will be balanced in '40.

The picture presented by the President's Budget message of January 3 of this year was actually more incomplete than would at first appear. Everyone knows that the expenditures for relief purposes continue to be one of the largest single items in the Federal Government expenditures. The present Relief Administrator, Mr. Hopkins, has recently expressed his opinion that the Federal Government must expect to continue to expend money for relief as a permanent part of its program. Everyone also knows that money which is expended for relief purposes will not be repaid to the Government.

For the fiscal year 1937 the President has already requested Congress to appropriate $1,500,000,000 for relief. According to the best evidence now available, this figure will not carry the Government through the fiscal year, and another request will have to be made to Congress in January of next year for additional funds for this purpose. Even assuming that the President was able to get by on the additional $1,500,000,000 requested, the gross deficit for the fiscal year 1937 would amount to $2,598,388,720, on the President's own estimate. Judging by the record which has been made during the last 3 years, the deficit will come nearer reaching the three and a half billion dollar figure.

What does all this mean to the individual citizen? It means that in spite of a new tax law every year since 1933, every one of which increased the tax rates, the present revenues of the Government are only about 65 percent of what is required to meet the Roosevelt expenses. Who is going to pay this? The rich? That is impossible, because the 1935 tax law was admittedly aimed at the wealthy. One of the fundamental rules of taxation is that revenues must be provided without discouraging initiative and enterprise. The 1935 act placed the rates as high as was considered possible without entirely ruining the source of revenues which it was intended to tap. If the goose that lays the golden egg has not already been killed, it certainly has been squeezed to the point where further squeezing would kill it.

This means that any additional revenues to run the Government have to come from people who are not wealthy. They have to come, in one form or another, from the citizen with a small income and from the so-called middle classes. The present tax bill is definite proof of this fact. In it the administration has abandoned its oft-repeated policy of making a distinction between the large taxpayer and the middle-sized and small taxpayers. In it any corporation having a net income of more than $10,000 a year is treated exactly on the same basis as the largest corporation in the United States. It makes no difference whether a corporation has a net income of $11,000 a year or $10,000,000. If the little company is attempting to retain its earnings so as to enable it to grow larger and for that reason 70 percent or more of its profits are not distributed, then the rate of tax is precisely the same as if the $10,000,000 corporation retains the same percentage of its profits. Likewise, all dividends are subjected to the same rate of normal tax, whether the taxpayer receiving them has a net income of $1,000 a year or $1,000,000. No longer can the present administration masquerade under the banner "Soak the rich." It now becomes the banner "Soak everyone."

But the difficulty does not end there. The present revenue bill is a typical example of the never-ending policy of the present administration to make changes which produce uncertainty. It proposes to overturn the entire system of taxing corporation earnings, which has been in existence for approximately 20 years and the people have become familiar with it, and to substitute a new system, the results of which the Treasury Department's own experts admit they cannot state. I intend, at this point, to enter into only a brief discussion of the inequities and hardships involved in the present bill but do want to mention some of them.

The avowed purpose of this bill is to prevent business organizations, large or small, from laying up surpluses. Or in other words, the proponents are opposed to a business having a life-insurance policy to carry it through hard times, the same as is done by nearly every provident man when he takes out a life-insurance policy to protect his family in case of sickness or death. Surplus in business is just a paid-up life-insurance policy to protect business in times of distress. I know from sad personal experience that if it had not been for the surpluses that well-managed businesses had laid aside in former good years the depression would have been worse; dividends, more needed than ever, would have been less, and unemployment much greater.

The surpluses of business have been drawn on during the last few years to the extent of nearly $27,000,000,000 to fight the depression, nearly twice as much as the Federal Government has contributed, and where would they have been without them? What would you have done during the last few years if Congress had been foolish enough to pass this kind of legislation 10 years ago?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Under the existing tax system, to which the gentleman refers, we had one of the most disastrous depressions in the history of the entire world.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate that; but it was the surpluses of business, accumulated in good times, that went a long way in relieving the distress of our people and helped to keep many people from starvation and out of the bread lines. If it had not been for that, I do not know what would have happened to the country.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. If the gentleman will yield for one further question, if this money had been forced out and evenly distributed, does not the gentleman think it would have helped to equalize and stabilize the situation?

Mr. SNELL. Well, I prefer to place some dependence on what has happened in the past rather than to depend entirely on experiments in the future. According to this law you will never have these backlogs again. It is going to be a deterrent to the small, struggling business organization which, in my judgment, is the backbone of our community life.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Under the present bill corporations having a net income of $10,000 or less can lay aside 42 percent of their net income into reserves without paying any more taxes than they are paying now.

Mr. SNELL. If they are not going to pay any more taxes, how are you going to get any more out of this bill, then?

Also bear in mind the fact that these earnings which are accumulated are reinvested in improvements and expansions which in turn are productive of income and additional revenue. Remember, too, if there are any discriminations in favor of corporations over individuals or partnerships, you can transfer your business to a corporation and then work under the same conditions as your competitors.

Will someone tell me why it is this administration is always proposing something to "soak the thrifty"; is continually discouraging saving and personal independence and rather encouraging shiftlessness and dependence on the Government for a living? Its whole policy toward working, saving, and taking care of yourself is wrong. It certainly is not the policy that built up America and made it what it is today.

Just think this over carefully before you do anything to destroy this system. Furthermore, I am concerned over substituting an uncertainty for a certainty.

If the purpose of the present bill is to raise additional revenues for the Government, then the plain, simple way of accomplishing that would be to raise the tax rates; and if that was not enough, then to broaden the tax base and start taxing all the little fellows directly instead of indirectly. Let the little fellow know what he is being made to pay instead of taking it away from him through indirect and concealed taxes. But this is an election year and such a course would be a clear indication to the people of the enormous drain which the present administration is making on their resources. It would bring clearly into focus the question whether it would be better to turn out of office the present party in power and substitute therefor a party which would honestly carry out an economy program or whether the present administration should be kept in power and the taxes raised to a point where their expenditures could be met out of current revenues. Any honest attempt to bring up the tax revenues to a point which would equal the expenses of this Roosevelt administration would mean the imposition on every person in the United States having any income whatsoever of taxes so high that the question would be immediately answered: The entire administration would be thrown out of office. To keep this from happening the present administration apparently decided to confuse the issue by raising the cry that a few corporations in this country were not properly distributing their dividends and to use this as a pretext for changing the entire existing system of taxing corporate earnings.

The present corporation-tax law has provisions to keep corporations from depriving the Government of revenue by improperly accumulating earnings and failing to pay dividends. If the purpose of the present bill is to correct any defects which may exist in the present structure of the tax laws, there are ample ways and means of accomplishing this. There are reforms which can be put into effect in the matter of administration. There are reforms which it would be perfectly possible for Congress to enact into legislation to cover the cases of abuse which the administration apparently had in mind when it proposed this sweeping revision of the law. It is not necessary to completely upset the entire system and threaten one of the principal sources of revenue of the Government. So far as I have been able to ascertain, no one has been able to predict with any degree of certainty the amount of revenues which this bill will produce and no one knows fully the effects it will have on business.

Personally, I believe it will destroy many small and struggling business organizations and is entirely in favor of the large corporations that already have a sufficient surplus. It will create monopolies and place additional hardship on small business or those organizations that have depleted their surpluses during the depression. It will destroy for all time the backlog that business had at the beginning of this depression and materially hamper the growth and financing of all new or small businesses that are the backbone of our community life.

The proper conduct of any business, be it small or large, requires that there be some basis on which plans for the future can be made with reasonable certainty. Without such planning we live on a day-to-day basis, subject to the vicissitudes of fate, without any of the usual protections or safety measures which every prudent person adopts as a part of his daily life. We all know that a continuing state of uncertainty in our personal affairs is not conducive of happiness. Uncertainty in business is not conducive to success or progress. One trouble with this administration is that it has no idea where it is going or what it is going to do from one year to the next or what the results of its proposals will be. It is founded upon guesswork and we are being led up one blind alley and then another. How much longer can the country endure the strain of being used as an experimental guinea pig? I submit that what the people of the United States now want more than anything else in the administration of their Federal Government is: First, a definite financial program on the part of the Government on which they can rely in the planning of their own affairs; second, an immediate stoppage of the wasteful spending of this administration; third, an adoption of sound business principles in the operation of the Government.

In conclusion let me suggest that if we are really trying to do something which will promote the welfare of the people of this country and of their Federal Government, such revolutionary schemes of taxation as the present bill ought not to be railroaded through Congress under the pretext of an emergency. They ought to be presented to a nonpartisan committee which would be given time to study the proposals from a nonpolitical point of view and to determine what the effect of such proposals will be. Perhaps such a committee should consider the broad question of a revision of the present system of taxation—Federal, State, and local. As to that I venture no opinion at this time. But, in any event, let us stop this practice of cramming down the throat of Congress all these revolutionary schemes without an opportunity to study them in a nonpartisan way and see what their effects will be. Let us stop this continuous substitution of uncertainty for certainty. Let us not pass a tax bill we know will not become a law; but just hope the Senate will make a real bill out of it before it goes to the President.

I regret we are not assuming our share of responsibility in passing an intelligent, understandable revenue measure that is a credit to the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER].

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, the Republican minority membership of the Ways and Means Committee which drew this bill state they had little opportunity to see the bill and are not familiar with the contents of the same. I concede it is clearly demonstrated from their discussions that they know little about the bill and their criticism is not confined to the real merits of the measure. The principles set forth in this bill were advocated by the President in his message of March 3. For 2 weeks the subcommittee, composed of Democratic and Republican members, studied and submitted a plan. For almost 2 weeks we held public hearings, in which all members participated and in which time we exhausted all the witnesses desirous of being heard. Learning that the minority membership would not support the bill, the Democratic members worked the balance of the time with the able assistance of our committee's legal staff. The minority knew what the bill would contain from the former report. Regardless of how the measure was drawn or what it contains, everyone knows its general import. This measure was conceived by a Democratic administration, the bill was drawn by the Democratic majority membership, and we take full responsibility for the measure.

It is true this bill is full of technical words and language that perhaps the ordinary person cannot interpret, and I am frank to admit with all the study I have made of the measure, which covered several weeks, there is much of it I cannot understand except when I hear it explained by tax experts, but that is true in connection with the drawing of all these hard technical tax measures.

The underlying principle of this bill is to require accumulated wealth, doing business in a legal form as corporations, to distribute its net income to stockholders or pay a tax upon such net income passed to surplus. It has been the policy of these unjustly enriched corporations, where the stock is held by a few, to pass their net income to surplus or undivided profits, thus escaping taxation. By this procedure, by the investment of a few dollars, stocks have increased in value thousands of percent.

There is no reason why a corporation should not be taxed on their net earnings any more than an individual or partnership. If they pay a dividend and thus distribute their net income, they are relieved from a tax and the stockholder pays a tax upon the dividends he receives. Of 257,000 corporations in the Nation, 214,000 have net incomes of $10,000 or less per year. These corporations can pass 42 percent of their net profits to surplus, the balance to dividends and be required to pay no more Federal taxes than under existing laws. In our opinion, 42 percent is a sufficient amount for these corporations to annually pass to their surplus. Of the 43,000 larger corporations, many of them are in the twilight zone, and will be treated the same as those with a net income of $10,000 or less. Much revenue will come from stockholders being required to pay the normal tax on their dividends.

It is not these small corporations, greatly in the majority in number, that are complaining about this bill. It is the same old story of entrenched wealth seeking to avoid taxation. They are the ones who receive more protection under our Government and they should bear their just burden of taxation. The measure collects a tax upon the net earnings from those who are able to pay. By the terms of this bill the deductions allowed under the present law can be taken, in arriving at the net earnings. In order to help those who are in the red, who have outstanding debts and mortgages scattered over a long period of years, a liberal provision is allowed for credit. In addition thereto, these corporations are allowed a credit for depletion and depreciation, which is generally figured at 10 percent, and the money retained in the company's treasury, which in the last 4 years has amounted to $16,000,000,000, half of the public debt of the United States. That is one opportunity of avoiding taxation.

The other main revenue feature of this bill is to collect 80 percent of the "windfall" taxes collected under the processing tax. We feel that those who collected the processing tax and failed to pass it on to the consuming public and have the money in their possession should pay at least 80 percent of it into the Federal Treasury. What right has any corporation or individual to retain and be enriched by a tax which they collected and which was to be used for relief of agriculture and industry? If they passed this processing tax on they are not liable. Inasmuch as the Government collected the processing tax on floor stocks when the law went into effect, we feel that merchants should be paid the tax upon the floor stocks on hand as of the 6th of January 1936, when the measure was declared unconstitutional. We have, therefore, provided for this refund.

The banks and insurance companies which, under the law, are required to keep a legal reserve, will pay no more tax under this measure than under existing laws.

The necessity of this bill, in order that the ordinary disbursements of the Government should not be more than the receipts, is to take care of the deficit, in the interest of agriculture and the payment of the bonus. By reason of the Supreme Court having declared the A. A. A. unconstitutional, the Government is required to pay back much of that tax and will be required to pay, in round numbers, one-half billion dollars a year for the soil-conservation program in the interest of agriculture.

We have heard a great hue and cry from our Republican brethren about balancing the Budget. Here is a fine opportunity to show their good faith. How can one be for an appropriation to aid agriculture and balance the Budget and then oppose raising the money from those who are most able to pay? They are in exactly the same condition as the Manufacturers' Association and the United States Chamber of Commerce. In fact, the minority report of the members of the Ways and Means Committee, which is amplified by their arguments, is in the very language of the spokesmen of these organizations when before our committee.

The United States Chamber of Commerce and the Manufacturers' Association, through their representatives, contend that we should balance the Budget and also contend that this measure will cripple and kill industry and business. They suggest no taxation to offset this necessary law. They never suggest remedial and necessary measures, but always oppose all measures which seek to tax or regulate entrenched wealth. They, like the Republican Members of the House, know that there is no other way to get this revenue except possibly through a manufacturers' sales tax or reducing the exemptions and increasing the income tax on the small incomes and the little man. They prefer to except big business from taxes and substitute a sales, excise, or processing tax upon the essential necessities of life, such as food, clothing, and so forth. For years their policy has been to make those who are less able bear the burden of government.

Mr. Chairman, we heard the distinguished minority leader [Mr. SNELL], in his concluding remarks today, say that in trying to get this money back from the big corporations we ought to broaden the base in order to get the little fellow. In other words, we should reduce the exemption and pass the burden on to the little fellows.

In this debate the Republican membership of the House have contended that there is no need for this tax, which is as much as to say that we should not have paid the bonus, which added nothing to the public debt, and we should have done nothing, in a financial way, to help agriculture. It is the same old cry they have made, voicing the sentiments of the representatives of big business, that there was nothing good that could come from the New Deal. However, an inspection of the record will show that on most of the New Deal measures the Republican membership of this House has voted for them.

This is an election year, and it becomes necessary for the Old Guard to find some thought to be contained in the Republican platform. They are like a Congressman I once knew who declared he was in favor of all appropriations but against all tax bills. They are in the attitude before their home people of being willing to receive all the benefits of the New Deal in their districts, but are opposed to responsibility and payment of the necessary tax. Some of them contend that the measure will not produce any revenue. Of course, this is not true or they would not be opposed to it. If it is true, then no one will be hurt. Like all tax measures, I concede there will be some inequities and possibly some will be injured, but in all such measures the question to consider is the greatest good to the greatest number. It took courage and statesmanship for President Roosevelt to recommend a tax bill in an election year. He could just as well have added these expenditures to the public debt or waited for the next session of Congress.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman has made reference to the position taken by the United States Chamber of Commerce in reference to this bill. May I ask the gentleman if it is not true that the leading spokesman for the United States Chamber of Commerce before the committee took the position that we should not levy this proposed tax on corporations, but should, instead, levy a processing tax on the necessities of life?

Mr. FULLER. He certainly did, and I offered a motion in the committee, which prevailed, eliminating that proposition. There is much talk about this bill not being properly prepared and that the Senate will have to rewrite it. It is a well-known fact that practically all of the legislation that the Ways and Means Committee of this House has drawn has gone through the House without amendment and 95 percent of it has stood up in the Senate without amendment. I am sure the same thing will happen in connection with this bill.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HOLLISTER. May I ask if anybody having connection with business life testified before the committee in favor of this bill?

Mr. FULLER. Well, not many.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Did anybody?

Mr. FULLER. Yes; a few.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Who were they?

Mr. FULLER. Does the gentleman mean businessmen?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Businessmen; yes.

Mr. FULLER. I do not know. I suppose there were not many, because they were satisfied. They were not like these big fellows who fought this thing through the Chamber of Commerce and through the Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DOUGHTON. May I state it is not customary for men to come before the committee and ask for additional taxes. A great many businessmen said to me that if called they would be glad to come and testify with reference to the virtues of this bill, but I did not invite any of them to testify except the experts of the Treasury Department. We could have had hundreds of them before our committee.

Mr. FULLER. Why should four-fifths of the corporations of the United States be opposed to this bill, since they will not be taxed any more than they are now being taxed? Why should businessmen come before the House and before the committees of Congress and oppose an administration that they have confidence in, an administration that has brought business out into the daylight and has caused prosperity to be returned to us!

Mr. HOLLISTER. I wonder if the gentleman can tell us whether in the history of taxation there was ever a bill reported to the Congress where all business interests appeared and opposed the bill and the forces of the administration were in favor of it.

Mr. FULLER. Oh, yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Arkansas yield?

Mr. FULLER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In my experience here I do not recall any tax bill where any businessman affected favored any tax. I recall, in 1932, the automobile industry of the country had one of the highest-priced lawyers they could get appearing before the Ways and Means Committee. We were told that if we levied the small excise tax that is now on automobiles and automobile parts it would destroy the automobile industry. We have lived now long enough to see the automobile industry lead the way out of the depression.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. If it is germane to this discussion; yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was going to make an inquiry about the witnesses.

Mr. FULLER. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What was the name of the witness who came before the committee and expressed his approval of this measure? I think he represented the Communist Party.

Mr. FULLER. Yes; he was one of your constituents—he was from New York [laughter], and he was most severely condemned by me. I hate them like a rattlesnake. Seriously, I think he was from New York City.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He is supporting your bill; why condemn him?

Mr. FULLER. He is not supporting this bill. It was too mild for him.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I know the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], who is really an illustrious Member of this body, and honors this body by being such an illustrious Member, while he smiles when he speaks of the attitude of the gentleman representing the Communist Party, if he will read the hearings and all the testimony of that witness and then say that he actually favored this bill, we are ready to take the burden relative thereto.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand he said this was a step in the right direction.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. He also said he was against the repeal of the corporate tax, the repeal of the capital-stock tax, the repeal of the excess-profits tax. He was not satisfied with only taxing the surpluses to be accumulated in the future. He wanted to tax the surpluses now in existence. He wanted to tax tax exempts. When you consider his entire attitude, he was against 99 percent of the bill.

Mr. FULLER. And I was against his appearance and surprised he was allowed to appear. I did not know he was a Communist. I will say one thing for my district. They cannot organize down there like they do in New York, parade the streets, and take possession of public places. We do not allow that where they are opposed to our Government and seek to tear it down and destroy it. [Applause.] I oppose all such communistic organizations which seek to destroy all value, advocate the existence of no God—have no regard for moral rights, and seek to rule by force. We should deport everyone possible.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FULLER. No; I do not care to yield any more on that subject. I do not want to waste my time on anybody that even bears the stain or mark of being a Communist.

We have heard much about the public debt. When President Woodrow Wilson left the Presidency in 1921, after the World War, the public debt was, in round numbers, $24,000,000,000. This debt was soon reduced $3,500,000,000 by repayment of war loans by European nations and the sale of Army equipment and supplies. Big incomes over an 8-year period should and did cause a big reduction. When President Coolidge turned over the reins of government to President Hoover in 1929, the public debt was, in round figures, $16,000,000,000. In 4 years under Hooverism, the happy days of Republicanism, and in the golden era of the high protective tariff, which brought ruin, not only to the Republican Party but to agriculture, industry, and the Nation, the public debt increased $5,000,000,000—not one cent of which went to relieve the worst panic in the history of our Nation. Not a cent of it went to feed and clothe the hungry, naked, and sick. Soup houses and bread lines prevailed all over the Nation; agriculture was prostrate; industry was bankrupt; banks were closing all over the Nation; the auctioneer's hammer could be heard every hour of the day; and yet a deaf ear and cold shoulder was turned to this condition. Even the pot that was to contain the two chickens could not be found. The corner around which prosperity lurked could not be located. That supposed garage for two cars was taken possession of by the homeless and hungry poor. Although given to understand that no one should go hungry or die for lack of sustenance, the administration did nothing. It was only due to the tender mercies of the Red Cross, charity of city and States which went bankrupt, that these people were able to live until a humane administration came into power. Certainly these conditions were not chargeable to the Democratic Party.

It is true that since President Roosevelt took office the Democratic administration has increased the public debt ten or eleven billion dollars, but we have something to show for it. We have restored our country to an almost normal condition; business is prosperous; confidence is restored; the national income is increasing; the poor and distressed have been aided; banks are on a firm foundation with their deposits guaranteed; public improvements of a substantial nature are in evidence in every community which will stand as a monument in future generations to a wise administration. Two million home owners, upon the farm and in the cities, are rejoicing that their homes have been saved from foreclosure and the auctioneer's voice. From the great increase in taxes resulting from business incomes this public debt will soon be materially reduced. [Applause.]

For the first time in the history of our Nation, due to the humanitarian foresight of our great President and a Democratic Congress, crippled, delinquent, and neglected children, the expectant mothers, the blind, and the aged have been granted relief and pensions. Certainly we have spent large sums of money, much more than we wanted to, but when we come into power we discovered that conditions were much worse than we anticipated under 4 years of Republican misrule.

Under such conditions it is right and proper, equitable, and just that big corporations should bear their part of the burden to take care of this relief program. Had it not been for the New Deal, all of the corporate business would have been on the rocks. We found it helpless and crying for relief and like dutiful parents we gave relief. Most of which is appreciated. Corporations being creatures of law, should be regulated by law and not permitted to go without regulation and taxation while individuals and partnerships cannot escape. If this law proves unjust and too burdensome, the same power that enacted it will be ready to amend it.

Let us see as to whether or not it is true, as contended by the minority, that this tax measure is not necessary and that it will kill or injure industry. They desire to pursue the old tactics of the sad days of Hooverism, by letting well enough alone, by protecting big business, allowing it to grow rich and opulent at the expense of the rest of the Nation. The entire Nation is convinced that there can be no prosperity in this country when the people as a whole do not prosper; that industry and business cannot prosper when the producers, the farmers of this country, fail to prosper.

When they contend we seek to destroy business, ask who restored the breath of life to these bankrupt institutions? Americans should thank God that in these days of "isms" and radical demands we have had such a great leader and President at the helm to steer the ship of state. [Applause.]

In the winter of 1932 and 1933, corn was selling in the great Corn Belt for 9 cents per bushel, it is now 60 cents; wheat was selling for 25 cents, it is now $1; cotton was selling for 5 cents a pound, it is now 11 cents; hogs were selling for $2.50 to $3 a hundred, now they are $10; cattle are today selling for three times more, and mules, horses, sheep, and all other farm products in proportion. This was brought about by the New Deal, by our agricultural program. We are now seeking to carry it out by a soil-conservation program, the money for which is provided for in this measure.

Let us further look at the record, to ascertain whether this program and the so-called New Deal is advantageous to the Nation and to business.

In the last 3 years on the stock markets cotton advanced 92 percent, wheat advanced 111 percent, corn advanced 152 percent, industrial production advanced 51 percent, listed stocks advanced 134 percent, and listed bonds 22 percent. And in this time unemployment declined 30 percent, public-utilities power production advanced 326 percent.

Big business, industry, and corporations have prospered under this administration. The following quotations from the New York Stock Exchange, from January 1, 1933, to January 24, 1936, clearly show how common stock and preferred stocks and bonds have doubled and trebled in value for almost all industry, including building materials, telephones, railroads, steel, tobacco, oil, manufacturers, public utilities, tire and rubber, mining, food and meat packers, automobiles, farm machinery, merchants, banking, milling, and so forth:

These are the same class of corporations it is contended we will ruin. All others have likewise advanced. Their bonds and stocks are higher now than last January.

When we passed the act controlling the stock exchange so these gamblers could not play with stacked decks and marked cards, and when we passed the Securities Exchange Act providing that corporations must pass inspection before being permitted to sell gold bricks and worthless securities to an unsuspecting public, the same argument was made that we were killing and bankrupting business and industry. The converse has proven true that these just regulations, stimulated and made legitimate business, and the same will prove true as a result of this tax measure.

We cannot always continue going into debt; we must collect as much as we pay out; in other language, balance the Budget. It is to be hoped that we can soon, as I feel we must, dispense with large appropriations for relief. But as we are emerging from this, the greatest panic and the most trying time of our Nation's recent history, it is necessary that we should carry on.

At times I feel sorry for the reactionary Republican membership of this House. They are the few faithful who have survived the storm, veterans of a lost cause. Here is hoping they may be long remembered and honored for their able defense of Republicanism at Waterloo. Personally they are fine fellows and from a Republican viewpoint real statesmen, loyal, able, patriotic Americans. But they are out of tune with that popular, very appropriate American melody Happy Days Are Here Again, and they are out of step in this great American march of progress. [Applause.] They are without a leader and are going hither and thither like a ship without a rudder. They are like the children of Israel, lost in the wilderness, their leaders gone, they have set up false gods to worship, emblematic of the high protective tariff and big corporations. [Applause.] Being driven from the pie counter to which they were so accustomed, is enough to make them desperate. I would that I could relieve the heartaches of this little band of battle-scarred veterans, that I could remove the scales from their tear-stained and swollen eyes that they might see the birth of a New Deal, a new condition in America in which unjust enrichment and accumulated wealth shall not be the dominant and controlling factor. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, in order that my good friend from Arkansas may remove some of the scales from his own eyes I should like at this time to set the committee right on the matter discussed a few moments ago with reference to the position of the Communist Party on this bill.

I find on page 385 of the committee hearings that Mr. Bedacht, the gentleman who appeared before the committee representing the Communist Party, made this statement:

> Of course, we are in favor of taxing corporate surpluses and undivided corporation income, but I shall try to show that the proposals of your committee leave loopholes which will be used by the big corporations to dodge tax payments in the future as they did in the past.

Then again, on page 389, Mr. Chairman, I find this colloquy between the very able and distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON], and the witness:

> Mr. VINSON. Mr. Bedacht, I understand you are against this bill because of the abolishing of the present corporate taxes——
> Mr. BEDACHT. Pardon me?
> Mr. VINSON. I say you are against this bill because it abolishes the present corporate taxes, the capital-stock tax, and the excess-profits taxes?
> Mr. BEDACHT. We are not against the bill. We say it does not go far enough. We say it does not go far enough.

Then again, Mr. Chairman, on page 390, there appears a colloquy between the witness and myself in which this statement was made:

> Mr. WOODRUFF. May I ask you this, Mr. Bedacht: You say you believe in taxing undivided profits and surpluses?
> Mr. BEDACHT. Yes.
> Mr. WOODRUFF. Then you must approve to a much greater extent the proposal originally sent to us by the administration which provided a tax of 33.5 percent on all surpluses? That is more in harmony with your views, isn't it?
> Mr. BEDACHT. Well, I base myself and my statement on the draft that was published in, I believe it was the New York Times, as being the draft of this committee.
> Mr. WOODRUFF. Then you are not familiar with the original proposition that was sent to the committee?
> Mr. BEDACHT. No.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK].

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, before I go into the remarks I have prepared for this occasion I think we should clarify this question of communism. I thought that this matter had been fully discussed by the incorporation on page 5999 of the RECORD by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL] of the essential portion of the testimony of Mr. Bedacht.

Other quotations from it have been incorporated in the RECORD by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF]. I think we ought to conclude the whole subject with the statement of Mr. Bedacht made on page 390 of the hearings, in which he said, in answer to a question by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, where the chairman said:

> You are against about everything there is in it. Then you could not be for it, could you?
> Mr. BEDACHT. I didn't say that.
> The CHAIRMAN. I said you just stated you are against about everything in it. Then you could not be for it.
> Mr. BEDACHT. Well, we are for it in addition to the old taxes. We are certainly not satisfied with the draft of the law as it was published by this committee.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Notwithstanding the fact on cross-examination he was against practically everything regarding the bill, would the gentleman from Michigan refuse to eat food cooked by a good warm fire simply because the devil uses fire in his business? [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODRUFF. I could not hear the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman will not say that I did not quote the record correctly. Mr. Bedacht said that the bill did not go far enough, and naturally he would not expect the majority of the House to report a bill that he would be 100 percent in favor of.

Mr. BUCK. He was opposed to the corporation tax; he was opposed to repeal of the capital tax; he was opposed to the repeal of the excess-profits tax; and he thought the bill ought to tax previously accumulated surpluses.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I think the gentleman is going a step too far.

Mr. BUCK. Let me read from the testimony:

> Mr. VINSON. Are you against abolishing the capital-stock tax?
> Mr. BEDACHT. We are against——
> Mr. VINSON. That is the present tax that is on the capital stock of corporations.
> Mr. BEDACHT. Yes.
> Mr. VINSON. $1.40 a thousand?
> Mr. BEDACHT. Yes.
> Mr. VINSON. Are you against the repeal or abolishing of the excess-profit taxes?
> Mr. BEDACHT. Yes.
> Mr. VINSON. Now, you say that this bill ought to tax present surpluses?
> Mr. BEDACHT. Surpluses accumulated up to now; yes.
> Mr. VINSON. The accumulated surpluses?
> Mr. BEDACHT. Yes.
> Mr. VINSON. And you think that they ought to be taxed?
> Mr. BEDACHT. Yes.
> Mr. VINSON. And I believe you say that you ought to tax tax-exempt securities?
> Mr. BEDACHT. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does not the gentleman think that we are making a mountain out of a molehill?

Mr. BUCK. I do. Let us call it a day and go on with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further. It is not my intention to answer all of the remarks the gentlemen on the minority side have made, because it must be extremely confusing for anyone who has endeavored to follow the debate on this tax bill to ascertain on just what grounds the minority is opposing it. It is true, of course, that they have listed in the minority report a number of objections to the bill, and each of their speakers has taken some phase or other of this report as a basis for opposition. But there has been no consistency in their plan and, indeed, no consistency in even the positions taken by individual opponents. I do not know that consistency is an indispensable virtue. Daniel Webster once said, "Inconsistencies of opinion arising from changing circumstances are often justifiable." But certainly it is inconsistent to oppose a bill on the ground that it will wreck business and in the next breath on the ground that it will not produce sufficient revenue. Circumstances are not changing while one speech is being made.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], in the course of his remarks, ascribed the source of the proposed graduated tax on income of corporations measured by the amount of earnings and profits set over to surplus to Under Secretary Tugwell, yet elsewhere in his remarks the gentleman from New York stated that this was a "method considered and rejected by both the Treasury and the Congress at various times during the past 16 years." I hope the gentleman will be able to agree with himself before the debate is over. The truth of the matter is, as the able chairman of the subcommittee on taxation [Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL] explained last Thursday, that this same principle, a provision that the gains and profits of corporations should be included in the annual gain, profit, or income of any person entitled to the same, whether divided or otherwise, was actually the law of the country from 1861 to 1872.

Now, that is just the aim of this most-discussed, revised form of tax on corporations; to prevent the accumulation of earnings and profits in corporate surpluses which are not distributed to the individual taxpayer and which thus free him from his just tax responsibility to the Government.

The provisions of the pending bill have been so thoroughly and ably discussed today by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] that I do not propose to repeat that explanation. I do, however, desire to say a few words about the philosophy of the major change made by it, and in doing so I want you to remember that this is a revenue act. At this point I compliment the minority leader [Mr. SNELL], who is the first member on the Republican side to admit that the purpose of a tax bill is to raise revenue. No matter if he did refuse to vote new taxes until some alleged waste of public moneys ceased, without ever specifying what that waste was. No matter if in speaking of deficits he forgot to call attention to the testimony of Acting Director of the Budget Bell—page 671 of the hearings—that the deficits for the fiscal year 1931, under the preceding administration, was $902,716,845; for the fiscal year 1932, $3,153,097,507; and for the fiscal year 1933, $3,068,266,874, or a total deficit for the 3 consecutive years of $7,124,081,226. Other members on the Republican side seem to have forgotten the purpose of this bill—revenue.

Philosophy, therefore, must be mixed with fact. The whole truth of the matter is that this additional money is needed as a result of certain definite events. The decision of the Supreme Court invalidating the processing taxes levied by the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which had been included in both the 1936 and 1937 Budgets; and the enactment of the Soil Conservation and the Adjusted Compensation Payment Acts by Congress. The first of these events imposed the necessity of raising some $517,000,000 of revenue, referred to in the committee's report. Of course, it is true that Congress could have avoided the payment of some $286,000,000 of this by refusing to appropriate anything for the payment of the benefit contracts that the farmers had already entered into in good faith, but I fail to remember anyone on either side of the House urging that that be done.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. It so happens it was my privilege to be presiding over the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union during the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill, which carried that item. I do not recall that there was a vote on either side of the aisle against the inclusion of that amendment, which was offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], chairman of the Agricultural Committee.

Mr. BUCK. I am sure that the gentleman is correct. That was my own recollection. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], who spoke against the bill, and some others, may, in all fairness object that they did not personally vote for the imposition of the additional obligation made necessary by the passage of the bonus bill, but the vast majority of Congress did, and it must assume the responsibility, therefore, of raising the additional funds. It is equally idle for the gentleman from New York or others to object to the other event which makes necessary the raising of permanent revenue, the passage of the Soil Conservation Act. It may not seem to them good policy, but again it has met with the approval of the vast majority of Congress, and the funds for it must be provided.

We are not facing the question of raising money for deficits incurred in past years. We are faced with the question of providing money for the particular items which this session of Congress has passed and has adopted—a farm program, permanent and additional funds for 9 years for the veterans.

In the course of his remarks, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] referred to the fact that the President, in his message in opening Congress, had promised that there would be no new taxes. For the sake of accuracy, I shall read into the RECORD the exact language used by President Roosevelt in that message:

> National income increases; tax receipts, based on that income, increase without the levying of new taxes. That is why I am able to say to this, the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, that based on existing laws it is my belief that no new taxes, over and above the present taxes, are either advisable or necessary.

Mr. Chairman, that is a very different thing from saying that no new taxes would be levied. The events I have referred to have happened since then—the invalidation of taxes that were in the Budget and the decision of Congress in these two acts to appropriate money. Let us therefore stop this theorizing and face the facts.

When we have to raise new moneys, it is necessary to go into somebody's pocket or to invade somebody's strong boxes. It is only natural that new taxes should be objected to. It is the privilege of the taxpayer to have proposed tax changes as carefully considered as it is his privilege later to have the tax laws strictly construed. On the other hand, it is our congressional duty to see that all loopholes in tax laws are closed and see that the taxes levied produce the maximum amount of revenue.

Some of the members of the minority have wanted to talk about retrenchment of expenditures. Retrenchment! Let us discuss that at the proper time. Let us find out what definite proposals the minority will make. But make them definite, my friends. Generalities will accomplish nothing. And this is not the time or the place. We are dealing here only with specific taxes for specific subjects and revenue required for specific appropriations. Back to our revenue bill.

One of the most serious evasions under the present tax law is the failure of corporations to declare as dividends their earnings and profits, and so keep them untaxed. Not only is the Government defrauded, but you and I, engaged in a partnership business, are placed at a disadvantage, for partnership profits are taxed to the individuals whether drawn down in cash or not. Similarly, I, as an individual doing business, am taxed on the full 100 percent of my earnings, whatever they may be.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] says that the new plan proposes to determine in advance, irrespective of circumstances, the amount of savings for every business in the United States, and said that we would not dare do that with regard to the farmer or the wage earner. Why, gentlemen, that is exactly what we do do in regard to them. One graduated scale confronts both of them, a tax on all their earnings. They have no opportunity to deduct from taxation the amount that the one may desire to invest in a new barn, or the other in new tools, which are the equivalent of the plant investment that the minority members have been talking about. No; every cent of their income, no matter for what it is spent, is subject to taxation.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] likens corporate surpluses to paid-up life insurance policies, but he should remember that the individual gets no deduction in his tax return for the money that he pays as premiums on any kind of life insurance policy.

I repeat, that all this bill proposes to do is to put the stockholders of corporations in the same category as partners or individuals.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY], with his usual and characteristic candor, stated "experience has conclusively and undeniably demonstrated one thing: that is, that people will avoid or escape, whenever it is within their power to do so, the payment of any tax." That, gentlemen, is just what has been happening throughout the United States for these many years, and is still happening today. I do not charge that corporations, by and large, are formed for the purpose of evading tax liability. There are a great many other advantages possessed by the corporate form of structure, including limited liability of the stockholders, concentration of management, and so forth, but when corporations do not currently distribute the major portion of their earnings and accumulate surpluses, they are depriving the stockholders of a return on their investment which they have a right to expect, and they are depriving the Government of the revenue that it has a right to expect. These accumulations may often have dire social consequences. Take for example the large amounts of money that were lent out from their surplus funds by corporations to stock market operators in 1928 and 1929. That these funds helped produce the ensuing crash in the market, few doubt.

That when they had been recovered from the borrowers they were subsequently declared in dividends, is claimed as a virtue by the minority Members, but they should have been declared in the years when they were earned.

On the other hand, if these funds remain idle, they are of no value to our social structure. They are a temptation to the management of the corporation to enter into a program of expansion of plant facilities, often unjustified, as we have learned from the overexpansion of these facilities during the so-called Coolidge boom. Capital becomes invested in plant facilities to a point where interest can no longer be earned on the investment.

One of the saddest things in this controversy is the failure of the minority to see that the declaration in dividends of accumulated earnings and profits will not decrease, but will increase new enterprises. I know that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] has propounded the theory that these declarations may be so heavy that large stockholders will dispose of their holdings and invest in tax-free securities. There is a possibility that some people may do so. The possibility is greatly limited by the fact that if conditions are such as the gentleman imagines, the present holders of these tax-free securities will probably not want to sell them. It is further limited by the fact that those who may dispose of their holdings will have to pay a capital-gains tax. Furthermore, the purchaser of such corporation's stock will thereafter be taxable on the dividends declared. I cannot see, therefore, why we should anticipate any loss in revenue to the Government from such a procedure.

Moreover, dividend money put into circulation must seek some form of investment, and it is not only logical but entirely natural that this money will be available in increasing quantities for the formation of new enterprises instead of lying idle as it does at the present. Even the dividends received by small shareholders, placed in circulation for the purchase of consumption goods, will require, indirectly, investment by someone to increase the consumer supply.

It has been further argued that the proposed tax system will destroy small corporations; that it will prevent the gradual growth of a new enterprise. All these arguments may be dismissed as nonsense. In the first place, small corporations are now in more danger of being put out of business by existing large corporations with huge surpluses which they can use to wreck their rivals than they will be hereafter; secondly, new corporations may set over to surplus, according to their earnings, between 30 and 40 percent of their annual income each year, and pay no more tax than they pay at the present time, and so gradually accumulate a surplus; or if their earnings are large enough from the start, they may, as long as the interests of the stockholders are not changed, reinvest the earnings in plant facilities and declare stock dividends tax free; or they may declare all the earnings in dividends, pay no tax, and have the stockholders reinvest the money in new stock issues; or the money may be declared as dividends and lent to the corporations by the stockholders. There are no penalties on advancement or expansion of business under this bill—only on the withholding of unduly accumulated earnings and profits from taxation. We are only concerned with seeing that these earnings go through the tax mill in the hands of the shareholder.

Of course, the corporations, and especially the small corporations, are not going to be the sufferers. It is the individual who holds a large amount of stock in some profitable corporation and who, through that corporation's failure to declare dividends, is escaping surtaxes, who is behind the protest against this principle of taxation, in whatever form that protest comes. That individual does not want to consider the question of tax inequalities. Nevertheless, it is our duty to provide the needed revenue for the Government and secure it where it can be secured without creating a tax inequality, and instead, abolishing one that exists. But, said the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], and I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], all a man has to do is to take his wife and daughter and organize a corporation. As to his income, he will then be on the same basis as other corporations and can accumulate his earnings and pay no tax. Other members of the minority have expressed this same thought in varying language. Are they hunting additional revenue or additional evasions? Are not these remarkable suggestions from those who are shouting "Balance the Budget"? Oh, yes, "Balance the Budget", they cry, but at the first real effort to secure money to help balance it, they revolt. I repeat, we are trying to raise money and not trying to increase the number of those who evade their tax responsibilities.

Governmental functions that are new have been called into existence as a result of popular demand. The people realize that these must be paid for by taxes. They do not object to paying what is demanded of them if they consider the tax fair. What the ultimate requirement that the Government revenue will be must depend on what the people demand of it in the way of service. In the meantime, as long as we depend to a considerable extent upon the income tax for Federal revenue, it is our duty to see that that income tax is distributed as equitably as possible, and that no one, through a corporate device, a fiction of law, is permitted to escape payment of his just proportion of that tax. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of discussion of this tax bill from a political point of view, and a great deal of discussion from the point of view of the raising of revenue. We all know that if money is to be spent, revenue must be raised. I imagine enough has been said about this for the time being. I do not think very much has yet been said, however, about basic theories of taxation as applied to this bill.

As I understand the theory of taxation there are three methods of approach. Taxation may be used as a means of coercion. The tax set up in the Guffey coal bill was a typical example of the use of taxation as a method of coercion. Taxation may be used as a weapon of social justice. When estate, inheritance, or even income taxes get beyond a certain point—and no one can tell exactly when that point is reached, even though the law of diminishing returns begins to operate—they may, of course, be carried still higher as a weapon of social justice to bring about the leveling of classes and the sharing of wealth.

Taxation is used chiefly, however, for the purpose of raising revenue; and it was our understanding when the President first suggested this tax that it was to be a tax for the particular purpose of raising revenue, not to coerce any particular group into any particular thing or to bring about any particular social readjustment.

There are several provisions in the bill as drafted which have little to do with the raising of revenue and which would seem to indicate that the chief purpose of the bill has been forgotten. As I stated earlier, if money is to be spent, we know it must be raised. If spending has stopped, if we were not raising all the revenue we should need for the next few years and were raising it on a permanent basis, we might give very serious thought to the complete change of the whole system of corporate taxation which this bill brings about.

No system of taxation, of course, that any one of us can think of is going to satisfy everybody, but it does seem that when we completely revamp the whole structure of corporate taxation we ought to give a little more thought to how permanent it is going to be, whether or not the total amount of revenue which is to be raised will bring about a balanced Budget, and whether or not we are going to be able to follow such a tax through to its logical conclusion and not consider it merely as a stopgap, which, in turn, will have to be eliminated, perhaps, next year or a few years in the future.

Whatever else may be said about this tax bill, it must not be forgotten that it will require deep study by lawyers, deep study by accountants, and a great deal of work which will be completely de novo. We will have to start again from the beginning and work out what this is going to mean to the corporate structure of the country. Whatever we may say of the existing tax laws, and heaven knows they are hodgepodge, and I am not here defending them, we at least have a certain experience behind them on which we can work, a certain number of years in which lawyers, accountants, and courts have given full consideration to the subject. To change this structure completely overnight and start afresh on a tax bill which is merely a temporary stop-gap seems to me a very unwise thing.

There has been a great deal of talk of the propriety of taxing corporations. The fact that a corporation enjoys a privilege which an individual or partnership does not enjoy is true, and that is why taxes on corporations are justified, even though the profits of corporations may in turn be passed on to individuals, who are again taxed for the same profits on which the corporation is taxed. But let us stop and consider what the corporate entity has done for this country. The reason people are willing to put their money into a corporation in order to achieve a certain business purpose is because they are relieved from certain responsibilities and hazards which they would have in the event the purpose were undertaken by them personally or by a partnership; there is ease of management, there is a flexibility which no individual and no partnership has, and there is also the very important consideration of limitation of personal liability. The development of corporations has made possible in this country the amassing of large sums of capital for industrial development. Whether in small corporations or in large corporations, the amassing has been the same, and through the use of these large sums of capital it has been possible to develop this country to an industrial position no other country in the history of the world has ever reached. This had been done chiefly through the use of the corporate entity. This does not necessarily mean we should give a corporate entity special privilege, that we should not tax it, that we should not limit it by proper legal restrictions, but it does mean that we should not necessarily consider the corporation as a thing suspect and say to a corporation, as we are doing in this bill, "You shall run your corporation according to a set of absolutely strict and inexorable rules which we lay down in this bill." We do that in this legislation without giving consideration to whether it is a corporation dealing with producers' goods or consumers' goods; whether it is a corporation which employs a large amount of labor with respect to its gross business, or a small amount of labor; whether it is a corporation dealing with a large mass or raw materials or small amounts; whether it is a corporation which has a high peak and a low valley of business, so that it must protect itself during the slack periods. We put them all on a uniform basis and say that over the years it is not permitted for them to accumulate surpluses without penalties.

Mr. Chairman, in the brief time allotted me it would manifestly be impossible for me to run the whole gamut of corporate enterprises in this country and show how different they are.

It is sufficient for me to mention this defect in pointing out how little study has really been given to an attempt to change the whole method of corporate taxation without due regard to all the differences of corporate enterprise in the country.

Let us take the matter of chain stores. Chain stores are not very popular, I am led to believe, on the floor of this House; yet it seems to me in this bill you have put the chain store in a particularly advantageous position. The chain store has little need to build up any kind of a corporate surplus. A chain store can restrict very quickly its purchases and its stocks of raw materials or even finished goods. It can very quickly close any number of its small stores and let out any number of workers. If you will examine the records of chain stores you will find that to a great extent their earnings are paid out in dividends; therefore, to that extent the chain stores, under this bill, become almost exempt from taxation.

Take, on the other hand, a company that engages purely in the production of capital goods; a company engaged in the manufacture of great machinery, for instance. Let us assume a company which makes, we will say, paper-making machinery, where one order runs up to $500,000 or more and where a concern which gets two or three orders in a single year is very lucky in these times. Is it possible for a concern of that kind to operate from day to day on a small accumulated surplus? In the very nature of things, if they are going to accept orders at all and be able to get those orders out, they must over a period of years accumulate a large surplus with which to buy steel, with which to pay their employees, and with which to do all of the other things which have to be done while the finished product is in process of manufacture, thereby differing absolutely from the other typical example which I gave of the chain store.

I could, if I cared to, take one corporation of one kind and another corporation of another kind and point out the manifest differences in the way in which they must operate. Yet, Mr. Chairman, what you are doing in this bill is to say with respect to every one of those corporations: "You must be handled in an absolutely ironclad strait jacket no matter what your situation is; the same rules apply as to whether you are permitted to accumulate corporate surpluses."

This is particularly harmful to the one line of business which had lagged furthest behind in the recent improvement, which many gentlemen have pointed out has occurred lately with respect to American business. The heavy-goods industries are those which have most lagged behind and it is those which are particularly injured by a bill of this nature.

Mr. Chairman, up to this time I have simply been discussing generalities, the theory of taxation behind this whole scheme, and why it is so unwise in order to raise a certain amount of revenue to adopt suddenly a new system of taxation rather than a flat corporate levy or a flat income-tax levy, or whatever it may be, which can be easily computed under existing law. However, there are a few particular things to which I want to call the attention of the membership, and perhaps I may best do that by addressing one or two questions to one of the gentlemen at the majority table.

I should like to ask the gentlemen if they can tell whether any thought has been given to the situation of a corporation which has made no definite contract against the declaration of dividends but is subject to certain contract conditions so that if dividends should be declared at all, or in excess of a certain amount, some very unfortunate condition will come into effect with respect to that corporation. Was any consideration given to that matter?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. To what condition does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I shall try to be specific. I understand the law to provide that in the event a corporation has made a binding contract that it will not declare dividends at all, or perhaps not beyond a certain amount, if that contract cannot be gotten around in some way, and if there is no way in which dividends may be declared except through breach of that contract, then a special arrangement is made by which the corporation pays a flat rate?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Where there is an express contract; yes.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Let me call attention to the fact that many corporations have either in the indentures covering their bond issues or in the agreements covering their debentures or perhaps in the provisions covering their preferred stock, a statement that in the event the corporation declares a dividend over a certain amount, or at all, then the mortgage will become due or the note will become due or certain voting rights in the preferred stock may be affected.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That would come under section 19.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I do not think so. That is where there is a binding contract. If the corporation declares dividends, it is in violation of the contract. But I am not asking about that. I refer to the case where there is no binding contract, but a very onerous condition which will come into effect.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. When I said "section 19", I was referring to the subcommittee report. I think the case to which the gentleman refers, if it does not come under the dividend section at all, would probably come under the debt section.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Why would it come under the debt section?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Because the gentleman referred to the indentures and the bond issues. If they mature in more than 3 years——

Mr. HOLLISTER. I am not discussing the debt situation. Let us assume this condition comes into effect with respect to a preferred-stock issue.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Let us suppose in the preferred-stock issue it is provided that in the event dividends are declared of more than a certain amount, then certain voting rights will come into effect or certain things will have to happen. Has that been covered in any way?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It seems to me that certainly comes under section 15, the contract provision.

Mr. HOLLISTER. That is not a contract.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Certainly it is a contract.

Mr. HOLLISTER. If the gentleman will read that section, the gentleman will see that it gives the exception in the event dividends are declared in violation of the contract. I am not discussing that provision. I am discussing the situation where there is merely a breach of a condition that is in no sense the violation of a contract.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not see why not.

Mr. HOLLISTER. If the gentleman does not understand the difference between a contract and a condition——

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman need not lecture me in that regard. I am trying to help the gentleman.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Of course, I must understand exactly what the gentleman is saying.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. But I am stating that, in my opinion, with that sort of statement made in your indentures, it would fall under section 15. Now, you have the deficit proposition in section 14 and you have the debt situation that probably would attach to the case the gentleman refers to in section 16.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Would the gentleman object to a perfecting amendment to clear up a condition of that kind?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I would want to see the amendment first.

Mr. HOLLISTER. But on theory the gentleman would believe that I am correct in stating that in the event this is not covered in the bill, it should be covered where a very unpleasant condition will happen to a corporation in the event it declares such dividends.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. When the gentleman submits the amendment, if it is not covered by sections 14, 15, or 16, we will be pleased to consider it.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Another matter I would like to call to the gentleman's attention is this: Why is provision made that one corporation, 80 percent of whose income comes from dividends in another corporation, is not enabled to take a credit if these dividends are paid to a holding corporation holding more than 50 percent of the stock of the paying corporation?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I should think that would be very obvious to the gentleman.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I would be very pleased to have the gentleman explain that.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I will give the gentleman an illustration. If corporation A declares out a dividend, and if the dividends are received in a taxable year other than the one in which they are declared, of course such dividends are subject to tax in the latter year. For instance, if the dividends are received in 1937 on income derived from a corporation in 1936, of course the tax upon the dividends would attach to the taxable year of 1937. If the dividends were paid by corporation A to corporation B and received by corporation B in 1937, it would be a very simple matter, without this language in the bill, to form corporation C and pay the dividends from corporation B to corporation C and have no tax in the taxable year 1937, and so on ad infinitum.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Would not corporation C have to declare them out?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes; but they do not get them until 1938.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Would not that be perfectly easy to cover by a reference to the particular year rather than the kind of corporation?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I would be very happy if the gentleman would submit something on that, because that section is intended to prevent pyramiding or prevent the setting up of corporations for the sole purpose of tax evasion.

Mr. HOLLISTER. That may have been the purpose, but what the gentleman has really done is to massacre a corporation——

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. We have heard a lot about the massacring of corporations.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I am not referring to what the gentleman has heard. I am stating what has happened. I am asking the gentleman some questions, and I do not want him to use all my time in stating what has happened. I am pointing out that what the committee has done is to take a whack at a holding corporation of that kind, whether a utility or not, and practically put it out of business.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. A personal holding company?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Does the gentleman want to ask me a question?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. No; I will never ask the gentleman a question again as long as I am a Member of the House. I thought the gentleman had yielded to me.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I shall be very pleased to yield, but I have only a minute or two.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I was trying to help the gentleman by saying that this refers both to operating company and personal holding companies as well.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman misunderstands me. I am not discussing personal holding companies. This is not a personal holding company. This is the case of a corporation which gets its dividends from another corporation and, in turn, is held by a third corporation and has nothing to do with personal holding companies.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Personal holding companies are also involved here.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Not in this particular aspect of it.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I wish the gentleman would point it out or get someone on his side to point that out.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HOLLISTER. There are a number of questions of this kind, Mr. Chairman, which we could go into, but the bill in its present form I am assuming will never become law. Manifestly, even if the Senate does not very greatly change this whole theory of taxation, which I confidently predict, it will certainly fill up some of the gaps now in the measure, because you can drive a coach and horse through it in 20 different places. It is a typical example of trying, in a few days, to revamp the taxation set-up which has been built up over a period of years, and which may not be the best we can get, but, at least, is based on considerable sound experience.

The particular worry, it would seem to me, in a bill of this kind, would be what the average person will be able to do who is trying to consider what his taxes are going to be under this measure. It will be easy enough for the large corporation to get expert accountants and get excellent attorneys to handle the picture, but it is going to be the hardest thing in the world for the little fellow to know what his tax liability is going to be.

I know I will be met with the familiar argument, "Oh, what you are really trying to do is to comfort the big corporation and soak the little fellow and you are just talking the other way around", but I want you to think it over as you read this bill. What would you do if you yourself had to sit down, running some little business, and figure out just what change it meant in your whole corporation set-up? Just think that over without listening to the camouflage that may be thrown over the thing by a few excellent orators.

Think what it means to any man trying to work out the meaning of this bill for his own particular business. It does seem to me that in this bill, in addition to the unsoundness of the basic tax principles, we have another example of attacking thrift. That seems to be the aim today. There is no encouragement to save, there is no encouragement for accumulating something to pay your debts, there is no encouragement to do those things which have made this country great.

This bill says to the corporations, "Do not accumulate a surplus, do not collect something to carry you through a rainy day, do not lay aside money so that you can employ labor when hard times come again." It is another manifestation of that continual gnawing at those things which have made this country great.

This bill, if it becomes a law, will do much to disrupt and hamstring the present corporate set-up in this country. If this bill is not so drafted as to carry this method of taxation through to logical conclusion and make it permanent, then it will be nothing but a temporary stopgap and should not in any instance be put into effect at the present time. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON], in the course of his statement, mentioned the fact that there were only seven Members of Congress who voted against the 1934 revenue measure.

I have the good fortune or the misfortune to be one of that seven who voted against it, and if I had the opportunity I would vote against it again today.

Today I am like the Shakespearean actor who went into a restaurant and ordered everything on the bill of fare but had no money in his pocket to pay for it. He was thrown out. About a year or two later he went back and ordered everything on the bill of fare and then called the manager, and he said, "Do you remember the Shakespearean Hamlet who came in here a year ago and had no money and ordered everything on the bill of fare and had to be thrown out?" The proprietor said, "Yes." "Well," he said, "I think you will have to perform that same painful duty again today." [Laughter.]

I expect it is going to be my painful duty to vote against this bill when the time comes. And I do so for a reason. Understand, every Member of this House has to discharge his own responsibilities according to the light given him. In that connection I might say that when the gentleman from New York chastised the House the other day—it was a verbal chastisement—because only 34 Members were present on the floor, I admit, in deference to myself and in fairness to my constituents, that I was one of those who was not on the floor—and for a very good reason. I had been listening patiently for hours seeking to gain some light, understanding, and erudition in respect to this bill. Perhaps the fault is lack of perception on my part. In any event, I did not get it.

So I went back to my office with the bill and a copy of the report and undertook to get what little truth I could get out of the bill. It is our individual responsibility, and we are going to have to discharge it the best we know how, and I am going to vote against the bill. Yet I can meet the majority two-thirds of the way and still vote in the negative. First of all, I recognize the need for taxes. I voted for many of the appropriation bills, I voted for the bonus, I voted for the Soil Conservation Act, and I have been going around the country preaching against an unbalanced Budget. I do not want to be in the inconsistent and hypocritical position of shouting, like an Ishmael in the wilderness, about a balanced Budget and at the same time not assume my responsibility about getting that Budget balanced. But that is no reason why one has to vote for just any bill that is dragged into this Chamber. I think the inference went out this afternoon, after listening to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER], that because we had incurred this responsibility we virtually had to vote for the bill. That is not, as the lawyers say, a sequitor. It does not follow that you have to vote for this bill just because you voted for the bonus and the Soil Conservation Acts. Such an intimation begs the question. We need taxes. There is no question about that. Consequently I subscribe to the theory that we ought to levy taxes on the basis of ability to pay. That theory has been so thoroughly written into the tax laws up to this time that I believe every Member of this House subscribes to it. Moreover, I do not believe that corporations as such repel the idea of corporate taxation. The whole question here is not whether we need taxes, because we do, not whether we are going to levy them on the basis of ability to pay, because we are, and I believe in it. The whole question involved in this bill is, Is this bill proper, is this fair, is this the adequate way to go about it so as to conserve the national well-being and still get the money? That is the basis on which I am going to have to vote, and that is the basis upon which I shall vote in the negative.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Please let me continue for a little bit. I am not one who comes here and seeks in a categorical way to make a statement that will solve the tax problems, because, compared with some other Members of this House I am by no means an expert on the subject. I am willing to learn. I have to act according to my own lights. I do not believe that it is going to destroy the country. It may or may not bring in big revenues. I am not sure about that, but here is one thing I feel reasonably certain about in my own mind. I think we are reversing a policy that we started a few years ago when we went on the theory in much of our legislation that passed this House of making corporate enterprise healthy, and keeping it healthy for the sake of the stockholders and bondholders. Pick up a bond indenture in a general way, for instance—and I have seen a lot of them in connection with our work on the Sabath committee—and you will find that almost invariably they carry a recital to the effect that a definite ratio must be maintained between assets and liabilities. The whole idea there is safety. When we passed the Banking Act of 1935 we said in substance there could be no dividends until one-tenth of the profits had been allocated to surplus, and until the surplus was equal to the capital, and why did we do that? For the purpose of making banks healthy and keeping them healthy. Now, if we take corporate enterprise, private corporations, for instance, you will find that over two-thirds of the States prevent any corporation from paying dividends if paying them is going to impair the capital, and if they do, the Attorney General will probably proceed by quo warranto proceedings before they get through. What I am seeking to stress is the fact that we have built up a philosophy of making corporations healthy and keeping them healthy by having a backlog or a reserve. We have given the Security Exchange Commission vast powers to assist in effecting such a condition. We are called upon now to determine whether or not the allowances made in this bill are insufficient, and we have to answer it as individuals. I think there has been some misconception and misapprehension in the sense that we have confused working capital and reserve. At least so it appears to me from the discussion here, and I do not like to put myself in the position of wanting to tell corporate enterprise just how much reserve they ought to accumulate or not accumulate.

In may be that we can articulate a kind of pet hate against some corporation or individual by saying, "We will write into this bill a philosophy of forcing out dividends whether or not, in order to get them into the hands of the stockholders so that they can pay taxes." Perhaps it is a different philosophy. Perhaps the idea is to build up a kind of purchasing power along with developing a substance that can be taxed in the hands of the shareholder. But, after all, the shareholder is not penalized, because if there is a reserve, it is reflected in the value of the stock; and if the shareholder wants to cash in on that reserve, all he has to do is to sell his stock and he gets his proportionate share of the reserve in a kind of appreciated value. But the thing I want to say is that it comes right back to the gospel of thrift. It is a case of starting out to protect the investors, the stockholders, and the bondholders of America by developing thrift, making these corporations healthy, and keeping them healthy, and now we come along and undertake to impair that health. I do not say we will do it, but we might do it, and I dislike to be in the position of lending myself to support of that sort of a bill.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Is it the understanding of the gentleman from Illinois that under this bill a corporation, for instance, that has a capital deficit or a corporation that is in the class where dividends are prohibited by law, that any dividends that are declared in such a case come under this provision?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not know whether they do or not, as a matter of fact.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will take that up privately with the gentleman afterward.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It is important for the House to know that the distribution of dividends of that character is the distribution of capital, and is not taxable at all. Section 14, I think, reaches the very conclusion which the gentleman desires to reach.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not have time to discuss that now. I will take that up with the gentleman privately.

I want to give the other reason why I am opposed to this bill. The biggest problem on the threshold of America today, and to which everybody in this House will subscribe, is the problem of unemployment. We are going to knock down all the good that has been accomplished since 1933 unless we can get people back to work. Who is to put them back to work? We only have two generic employers in this country. One is private industry, and the other is the Government. By "government" I mean county, city, State, or Federal Government. If you are fortunate enough to be elected to Congress or get a job as mail carrier or clerk of the court, you are on the Government side, and if you cannot get a job over there, then you have to go to private enterprise. We have to look to private enterprise to solve the unemployment problem. How are they going to do it? I would rather follow the basic theories expressed recently, that sooner or later we will have to expand production and get prices down, because reduction in prices is the same as an increase in real wages. It will buy that much more and give the American people a chance to buy wanted goods. So it is sixes and sevens whether you boost wages or whether you bring prices down, but the whole theory is that we have to expand production. If you are going to kick these corporations in the face, if you are going to take away the reserves which they think are necessary to expand production, then at one and the same time you are giving them the devil for not expanding and giving employment to the unemployed and on the other hand you are taking away the instrumentality with which to do it. That is the reason why I voted against the 1934 Revenue Act. I never got a satisfactory answer to the questions in my mind at that time, nor have I gotten a single answer today. I see no relationship between this bill and the unemployment problem. It may be said to me, "Well, this is a special fund we are seeking to raise for the Bonus and the Soil Conservation Acts." That is the least important of the whole thing. The important thing about taxes always is the incidence of taxation, the place where they are imposed, the source of the money. If you are going to impair the source, if you are going to hurt the potential job givers, then we are not going to be in a position to solve the greatest and most acute and most dangerous problem that stands on the threshold of the country today, the unemployment problem. I see no relationship whatsoever between the philosophy of this bill and the solution of the problems that I had hoped would eventuate out of a tax measure of this kind. How can one very well discharge what he feels is the responsibility of conviction by voting for a bill of this kind?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, the gentleman recognizes that industry cannot employ unless they are selling their goods. They cannot sell their goods unless there is purchasing power. The gentleman realizes that, I assume?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Business is not just hiring out of the generosity of their souls. Some businesses claim they have souls, and I think they have, but they are not hiring people just out of generosity.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Does the gentleman mean to infer, for instance, that if through the operation of law we compel them to send out these dividends it is going to make a great deal of difference in the general purchasing power?

Mr. McCORMACK. Oh, yes; yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Well, I will say to the gentleman that there are 12,600,000 unemployed who do not happen to be dividend holders who are looking to efficient private enterprise to get a job. Here we come along with an arbitrary policy which seeks to impair confidence; and along with that, not academic at all, we are seeking to make a hole there that is taking away from them the instrumentality by which they are going to live.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a gentle and delightful irony in the statement made by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee early this week that might be considered a magnificent compliment to the perception and grasp of the Members of this body. On Monday of this week, while making a statement relative to consideration of the tax bill, the chairman, as recorded on page 5708 of the RECORD, said:

> So far as I know the committee will be able to take the bill up on Wednesday, but inasmuch as the bill will not be available to Members of the House until Wednesday I think it but fair to the House that we should not take the bill up until Thursday so as to give Members an opportunity to familiarize themselves with the bill and the report.

What could be fairer than that? But when I saw the 249-page bill, made up of 62,000 words so intricately arranged as to baffle an Einstein or a Philadelphia lawyer, I understood the whimsical import of the chairman's statement. In any event, Members of the House should be deeply grateful to the chairman for the high compliment.

Now let me set out some additional reasons why this bill may be the source of great harm and should therefore be rewritten.

First. In the first place our tax legislation should be so simple as to be understood by the humblest citizen. In no other way can a tax consciousness be developed so as to stimulate interest in national affairs and produce better government. Hardly anyone will contend that the pending bill meets the canons of simplicity. It has been said that it will produce a volume of profitable business for the lawyers. I doubt it. I doubt whether the most astute lawyers will understand it. What it really requires is a fiscal engineer, equipped with a slide rule, a knowledge of integral calculus, higher algebra, the theory of the fourth dimension, and a table of logarithms to understand it. Take for instance the passage on page 15 following the table, which reads:

> If the undistributed net income is a percentage of the adjusted-net income which is less than 10 (and such percentage is not shown in the foregoing table) the tax shall be a percentage of the adjusted-net income equal to one-tenth of the percentage which the undistributed net income is of the adjusted-net income.

The passages on the pages following that are equally abstruse and would do credit to Einstein. The Scripture says that faith is the substance of things not seen, and only through an overwhelming faith in the things which the language of the bill does not disclose could anyone bring himself to approve such a measure. I am afraid my faith is not equal to it. I prefer a little light on the subject.

Second. A good tax bill should not only be easy to understand but also easy to collect, free from uncertainty, should not stimulate litigation, and it's effect on the Nation's business structure should be definitely forecastable. I fancy that the task of collection under this measure will not only be of herculean proportions but costly. It's interpretation will require a whole new body of tax precedents and the litigation which it will inspire should be enormous. It was bad enough under existing tax laws. I am informed that even today there are income-tax cases pending now before the Bureau which are more than 10 years old. Thousands of old cases are still pending before the Board of Tax Appeals and in the Federal courts. It has been estimated that we develop 20 times more tax litigation in this country than they do in Great Britain, and if that be true it is high time that we revise our tax laws, our collection machinery, and regulations so as to minimize the amount of tax litigation and develop a sweeter attitude between the citizen taxpayer and his Government.

Third. Legislation like this imposes enormous expenses upon the taxpayer, and that is quite unfair. The fault lies not with the taxpayer but with the legislation. He, in good faith, after interpreting such an abstruse measure as this determines in full sincerity what he should pay. The tax experts in the Treasury think otherwise. Out of this differnece of opinion springs involved litigation. The taxpayer must engage attorneys, engineers, appraisers, and accountants to defend his position, and that is always costly. I am not reconciled to the view that tax legislation must be so involved and so confusing that the taxpayer cannot understand it without the need of constantly testing his rights before a court. In that respect this bill is a monstrosity. Nor can anyone justify the intricacies of this measure by saying tax bills of the past were also involved.

Fourth. This measure might prove harmful to business just at a time when there are evidences of recovery. I do not make so bold as to say that it will hurt business, but it may. Who will undertake to assure the corporate structure of this country that there will be no recessions, no depressions, no dislocations in the future. What assurances are there that the working capital exemptions are sufficient? Who will assure them that it is quite safe to dissipate their reserves because it "ain't gonna rain no more" after this depression is over? Of course, if we intend to make the R. F. C. a permanent relief institution, if we intend to expand the powers and the authority of the Federal Reserve and make Uncle Sam a kind of permanent Santa Claus, then this measure would be all right. No matter what happened in the future, business could rush to a Federal institution with hat in hand and look for a hand out to tide it over the rough spots. I, for one, am not ready to embrace so paternalistic a philosophy, and meanwhile I am not ready to project business out on the thin ice of uncertainty without proper reserves to meet contingencies. Look at the Interstate Commerce Commission in insisting that sinking funds and amortization features be set up in any railroad financing plans. Instances might be multiplied to show that by legislative enactment we have undertaken to make the corporate structure sound and keep it sound, and now we come along with a tax philosophy that seeks to make them weak and keep them weak. In a measure like this, we virtually set up an incentive for corporations to impair their capital structure, when in difficulties because of inadequate reserves, and I, for one, do not care to be a party to such a complete reversion of policy. It might be pointed out here that the Social Security Act imposes upon business, the need for larger reserves; it is difficult to apprehend just what the effect of this act might be upon business enterprise in that connection. Moreover, working capital is capital in process and cannot be considered as reserves for contingencies.

Sixth. It would appear that the effect of this act might be to restrict business operations and in many instances compel a contraction of business credit. There are countless corporations today in every field of endeavor which do a Nation-wide business on a basis of long-term credit. The aggregate of the credit which they extend is equal in volume to their surplus and in some instances to the capital. If, through the operation of this act, it becomes necessary to dissipate that future surplus accumulation through distribution without an adequate reserve, it is conceivable that such corporations must contract their credit extensions and voluntarily curtail their business operations. This may or may not be the case, but it is quite within the realm of probability. Translated into more practical terms, it might mean not only a curtailment of business but a curtailment of employment as well, and I do not care to lend my vote to such a possibility.

Seventh. From the standpoint of the stockholder it can hardly be contended that nondistribution of dividends operates as a hardship upon him. Accumulation of dividends not only adds to the solidarity of the corporation but is reflected in the appreciated value of the shares held by stockholders. A stockholder can at any time collect his share of the dividends by selling his stock. Nor need it be emphasized that small stockholders everywhere were the real beneficiaries of the prudent reserve policies of corporations which made it possible for many of them to continue paying dividends to such small stockholders in those tragic depressed days when stockholders needed that income.

Eighth. The effect of this measure on corporate financing of the future is to be sure somewhat conjectural and yet it cannot be overlooked. There is every indication that it will increase and heighten speculation in common stocks. The initial distribution to be made plus the distributions of the future warrant this conclusion. It must not be forgotten that as stock speculation is increased, there must necessarily be a transfer of interest from the bond to the stock side of the market in the future. In proportion as future corporate financing is made dependent upon stock rather than upon bond issues, so is speculation progressively increased and it is doubtful whether that would be healthy for the general welfare of the country.

Ninth. This measure appears as a calculated attempt to prevent corporations from repairing depleted reserves. Treasury experts estimate, and it has been stated on this floor, that for the next year four and one-half billions of corporate income will be withheld from stockholders, and that on this huge sum the Federal Government will be deprived of one and three-tenths billions in revenue. The figures are, of course, nothing more than bare estimates, but even when so considered who shall say but that corporations are merely repairing the losses in reserves that were occasioned by the depression and simply restoring a healthy corporate condition? Apparently such a healthy condition is not desired by the Treasury experts. By compelling indiscriminate distribution they, in effect, say to a corporation that if it experiences losses through fire, flood, or from any other reason, it can go to a bank and borrow funds for the rehabilitation of its business instead of going to its accumulated reserves for that purpose.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, may I say that perhaps it would be unfair to indulge in captious criticism without offering some constructive suggestion as to a substitute? My suggestion is, therefore, this: Why not keep the present corporate taxes in effect and perhaps raise the rates slightly to effect the additional six hundred and twenty millions that are required to meet the bonus and Soil Conservation Act requirements? There is at least a certainty about those revenues now. I understand that the excess-profits tax, the capital-stock tax, and the corporate-income tax now yield in excess of $1,100,000,000. An increase in those rates would produce the necessary revenue and preserve the precedents that have been built up during the last 20 or more years. If then it becomes necessary to enforce the payment of some dividends, that might conceivably be worked out by permitting a draw-back on funds that have been distributed.

To date no justifiable reason has been given for completely destroying our present tax system and the substitution of an entirely new and doubtful tax philosophy.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, since the committee report became available I have attempted to make a study of this bill. I have given more consideration to it and paid more attention to its provisions because of certain remarks made on this floor by my distinguished colleague from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] on Friday last, which I did not then have an opportunity to answer. His remarks were very brief, but in conclusion he made this statement. I quote:

> The asinine philosophy of the theorists now advising the present administration—unsound philosophies and theories which make thoughtful men and women cry out, "How long, O Lord; how long?"

I am sorry my colleague is not here. I hoped he would be. I had the honor of serving with him in the New Hampshire Legislature, and I knew him as Governor of the State. He is always crying out, "How long, O Lord; how long?" If you will follow his addresses made in this Congress or anywhere else you will see that this is true. For instance, in an address on neutrality delivered over the radio on January 3 of this year and printed in the RECORD; in an address on the 2d day of February on soil erosion and the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill he talked about the Almighty, crucifixion, and honest-to-God soil erosion.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to no man in my respect for the Divine Providence; but I say that we as a nation are ruled by a civil government, and these things about which my colleague talks with a prayer book in one hand and a Bible in the other will continue just as long as it is the will "of the people, by the people, and for the people" under the administration of such an outstanding general as Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause.]

Why, I picked up last Saturday's Manchester Union, a paper published in my district, the president of which is a Presidential aspirant, Frank Knox. I find my colleague's statement, to which I have just referred, printed on page 5 in small type, while on the front page of the same paper, Saturday morning's paper, April 25, in large headlines I find this statement in capital letters.

> New high record in national bank deposits reached.

Followed by a subhead line as follows:

> Exceed 1928 figure by 2.10 percent, O'Connor reports.

I now read as follows from this article:

> The total assets of all national banks were $28,293,019,000 on March 4, an increase of $68,318,000 since the previous call, and a gain of $2,333,736,000 in the last year.

In heavy headlines on the first page of the financial section of yesterday's Sunday Star, published in Washington, D. C., I find this statement:

> Store sales tend higher following post-Easter lag. A high plateau of activity was reached last week by business and industry in the United States.

I find in heavy headlines across another column of this same paper the following statement:

> Securities' drop fails to disturb business upturn. Industrial activity greatest since spring of 1930. Earnings mount. Machinery bookings best in 5 years. Corporation profits rise.
> In 1935 the net profit of a group of 900 corporations was 47 percent in excess of 1934.

I also read the following quotation from the Star:

> RECOVERY CHEERS MOVIE INDUSTRY—BOTH RENTALS AND BOX-OFFICE RECEIPTS SHOW STEADY UPWARD TREND
> NEW YORK, April 25.—A marked increase in motion-picture attendance is the outstanding feature in this industry for the first quarter of 1936, according to a new survey issued by Poor's Publishing Co.
> From the low point reached in 1932, motion-picture attendance has risen steadily, with 1935 recording gains better than had been expected. Theater attendance for last year is estimated at 80,000,000 weekly—15 percent above 1934.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Is it not a fact that the hardest task the opposition newspapers will face in the coming campaign is the finding of sufficient material on which to base carping criticism in their editorials, especially in view of the facts revealed on their financial pages?

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. It certainly is a fact. Editorial opinion, of course, is frequently an expression of partisan political feeling, but their financial writers are giving the facts. These facts, Mr. Chairman, I assert, in conclusion, tend absolutely to show how false were the statements made by my colleague in this House last Friday when he talked about unsound philosophy and theories making thoughtful men and women cry out, "How long, O Lord, how long!" I believe that with the passage of this bill we shall help the people of this country shout with joy, "Thank God for keeping open the road to further happiness and prosperity." [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee, I find very little occasion to rejoice over the small part I was privileged to play in the drafting of this tax bill. I do not believe even our most able members on the committee were very much pleased with the arduous task of having to write a tax bill. The fact remains, however, they have done a splendid job on their assignment, and I am pleased to go along, cost what it may. When I voted for the bonus, Mr. Chairman, and to override the veto, I realized it would be necessary to provide funds to pay it. In this connection I may say that six of the seven members of the committee who signed the minority report voted for the payment of the bonus and also voted to override the veto. We may have different ideas as to the means and the method with which to pay the obligations of this Government, but we agree and understand that to vote for an expenditure requires, as a matter of consistency, a vote for a tax bill to provide money with which to pay.

The responsibility is primarily that of the majority and certainly the minority could not expect to write this bill. That would be altogether too heroic on the part of the majority membership of this House; and it seems to me that, inasmuch as the great bulk of the membership of the House, without regard to party affiliation, have voted for the bonus payments and have voted for such beneficial payments as are to be made to the farmers, and there was no opposition when the question came up before the House as to meeting the obligations incurred by this Government to the farmers, that it is now time to stop quibbling about details and go along with something that is concededly sound and equitable.

Mr. Chairman, in this instance I am convinced that the bill will do no harm to the big corporations. A majority member of the committee the other day made reference to a large corporation in Detroit adjoining my district, the Ford Motor Co. Now, I do not think the Ford Motor Co. needs any defense at my hands. Certainly they have never asked for any assistance and have not appealed to this Government for a reduction or preferential status as regards taxes. Even during the high-handed days when Mellon was handing out money right and left in refunds, I do not believe the Ford Motor Co. every asked for or received a single, solitary dime. The Ford Motor Co. will always meet its responsibility. It will pay its taxes and will always willingly pay its share of the expenses incurred by this Government. I do not believe they need any defense here at my hands, nor to be cited by anyone as an example of a corporation which is marked for deliberate destruction.

In the consideration of this bill before the committee we learned that many corporations have for several years withheld the payment of dividends. I remember distinctly one witness who came before the committee testifying that there were something like 60 stockholders in a certain corporation, nearly half of whom were on the pay roll. I believe he admitted that large salaries were paid the officials, together with certain bonuses, perhaps not in the last year or two, but that had been the policy. Reserves were being accumulated. But this corporation did not see fit to pass on this money to the stockholders which rightfully belonged to them. It was the object of the stockholders who were the officials of the company to retain as much of this money as possible in reserves in order to insure their own salaries for the future. In the meantime, the stockholders whose money was being used in the business were ignored and their interest was not considered in the slightest degree. Under the terms of this bill, the stockholder will receive that protection which the board of directors failed to give him previously. This witness admitted that he had just enough stock to qualify as a director of the company and as an official. He admitted he was receiving a large salary—this to the detriment of the other stockholders. This bill has for its purpose the correction of some of these inequalities. It is my contention that when the earnings of corporations are handed to the stockholders, where they rightfully belong, the Government will then get its share, which will be but a fraction of that received by the stockholders, and, incidentally, only those stockholders who are large stockholders will be called upon to pay the normal income tax. The little fellow will get away from that, because he will not be subject to the income-tax laws as at present constituted. When the stockholders receive this money in the form of dividends, it will add to the buying power of hundreds and thousands—in fact, I should say millions—of stockholders, and in this respect it will add to employment, something which my friend from Illinois expressed such deep concern about, and he has been consistent in that regard. We have been together on several issues, although we are divided along partisan lines.

If the philosophy as contained in this bill prevails, it will undoubtedly scatter the money among a greater number of people and will increase the purchasing power—therefore alleviate unemployment. I have seen much in the newspapers as to the conditions which exist in this country. I have read articles by some of the paid propagandists, who look upon general conditions in this country through a perpendicular crack and who thus obtain a sort of a cockeyed slant on economic conditions and on life. I refer to propagandists like Haney and a number of others, who pose as economists and who are constantly writing about something that they either know nothing about or are endeavoring to misrepresent to the public. They appear on the pages of these newspapers supposedly as unbiased economists, portraying their viewpoint as reflecting conditions which they find to be bad and growing worse.

As a general rule when I read a newspaper, especially a partisan paper, I compare the financial page and the news items with the howling, biased editorials, and there I find how gross is the abuse of the public confidence and the utter disregard for the truth. For the past 3 years conditions have been improving—banks bulging with deposits; business on the upgrade—but partisan propagandists either fail to see the improvement or ignore what is evident to all fair-minded citizens.

Yesterday I noticed an article in a local paper regarding freight loadings.

The freight loadings increased in the last 2 years 8.6 percent. This has been an increase of 20,519 cars, or 3.3 percent, compared with the preceding week and an increase of 31,516 cars, or 5.2 percent, compared with a year ago and an increase of 50,952, or 8.6 percent, compared with 2 years ago.

This article refers to the increase in carloadings, which means an increase in the finished products of automobile concerns and various other factories and manufacturing institutions throughout the country.

There is not a single Member of the House who would do anything to retard prosperity. Even the Republican Members could not reasonably stand in the way.

I am confident this bill, if it does anything, will more equitably distribute the responsibility of tax payments. Certainly, we cannot tax the little fellow who struggles for an existence, we cannot tax the unemployed, and, personally, I cannot go along with those of my friends on the left who would offer a substitute of some kind, since I do not know what they have in mind. I cannot find that they are proposing anything definite as a substitute for the majority idea. They are simply against this bill but offer no alternative plan of their own.

I have some notion, perhaps, of what might be in their minds, a uniform, general sales tax; in other words, a tax that will be placed upon the shoulders of the average individual, who is least able to bear it.

Under the terms of this bill, Mr. Chairman, as I have understood it all along, out of the 257,000 corporations, something like 214,000 small corporations will receive a tax cut of up to 50 percent compared with the tax schedules under the present law. Several thousand additional companies or corporations, in all probability, will pay the same or about the same amount of taxes, and the balance of the corporations, best able to pay, will be called upon to make substantially larger tax payments. Certainly, I could not go along even with the majority, if I had the slightest suspicion that this bill was going to destroy the industry in my district, and I have as much in the way of industry to look after as any other man sitting in this Chamber at any time.

I was very much interested in the windfall taxes and anxious to render every possible aid to the companies subject to proposed tax. To some extent I have been successful. I proposed that the recovery under the windfall taxes, instead of being 90 percent, as originally proposed, should be 75 percent. The committee did not see fit to go along.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Michigan 2 additional minutes.

Mr. DINGELL. The committee did not meet my demands to reduce the percentage of recovery from 90 percent to 75 percent, but the committee did compromise, and the bill provides for an 80-percent recovery, which squares with what is about the practice of the Treasury Department in similar instances.

I proposed, too, Mr. Chairman, that where a corporation, or I should say a processor, has shown a net loss that the wind-fall tax will not apply. Together with my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] we discussed this matter with Mr. Helvering, and he agreed to go along. The idea is now well on its way toward becoming the law.

So I am not at all concerned about the ability of those who are to be reached in this tax bill, because the committee, in this instance, as even in the past under Republican rule, has not attempted to destroy corporations but has tried to place the tax where the burden could be more easily borne.

I propose, Mr. Chairman, to vote for the bill, and I may say to you that while we are not any of us proud about our share in bringing out a tax bill, yet I feel certain that I can go before my people and say that at least in this instance the tax is equitable and just. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER].

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, in all my years of experience in the House I never remember there having been grown in the legislative garden a perfect specimen of a tax bill. I never recall one that was satisfactory to everybody. In other words, there never has been a good tax bill.

A tax bill ought to be a matter of nonpartisan discussion, but it never has been, and it has not been during the discussion of this bill. Much of the argument has been very far afield in this discussion. Taxation has always been a serious problem. I think we can look back into Bible history where the citizens, even in those days, addressed the Savior in this language: "What shall we render unto Caesar?" This was a problem in taxation, and throughout all the ages of 2,000 years and more they have been asking that same question, and we are asking one another that question today—what shall we render unto Caesar?

Of course, we need the money. My good colleague and good friend from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] this morning spoke of the Hoover period of depression. I want to remind him that we are now in the fourth year of the Roosevelt depression—the fourth year is just commencing—and the necessity of increased revenue is more evident than ever at this moment.

I cannot speak for all the minority, but let me say for myself that I realize keenly the necessity of revenue, and there might be a tax bill prepared that under such circumstances I would be willing to vote for. I have my own ideas about what we might do in a revision of the rate structure in the present law lowering the figures somewhat on our exemptions and raising the rate on the low and intermediate incomes. However, I believe the people of this great Nation are of the opinion that any form of new taxes should be accompanied by a drastic reduction in wasteful spending, and I agree whole-heartedly with that conclusion.

But, of course, we cannot hope to have a tax bill of that kind in an election year.

There has been a good deal of criticism about the way the bill was prepared. The President's message was submitted to a subcommittee, and that subcommittee worked long hours tirelessly and zealously to prepare—not a bill, but to at least prepare an outline of a bill that would form a reasonably good background on which to hold public hearings and on which the business interests of the country might be heard.

While that was not a perfect method, it was a much better plan than we had in 1935, when the hearings were largely a farce held on some glittering generalities contained in the President's message.

This time the subcommittee gave considerable thought to the subject and study with the aid of Internal Revenue and Treasury officials and various experts from their own staff, who presented a very fair background of the subject matter for the business people of the country to oppose or favor.

Of course, the better way would have been to have had a bill and had hearings on the actual bill, on the document which will govern what business people will pay in the next tax year or longer. I hope it may be longer than 1 year. We are changing the taxing policy year after year, due to so-called emergencies, and I am wondering when the word "emergency" will be stricken from the vocabulary of the present administration.

I think the policy adopted in this bill is basically unsound. Taxing the undistributed net income is indeed a radical departure from existing methods.

The proposition may have some merit. I am not going to set up my opinion against the judgment of all of the tax experts, of which there are many in this country, but it certainly is debatable as to whether there is any merit in this proposition. But there is one question which, to my mind, is not debatable, and that is that such a radical revision of corporate taxation is extremely unwise and unfortunate at this time. When you know that in the last 4 or 5 years thousands and thousands of small corporations have suffered impairment in their capital structure, and now are facing a situation where the penalty or pressure rates will make it difficult to repair that damage.

I know that this bill is better than the outline that came to us in the President's message.

I think the cushion provision advocated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] and worked out by him largely has been materially helpful in this bill, without question. In its original form it might have destroyed in a few years many of our corporations. However, there are some conditions of unfairness that still exist, and the rate seems pretty high in many instances. If a concern has $100,000 of adjusted net income this coming year, and has had 2 or 3 years of debt, and they think it is advisable for the sake of their stockholders—not only for that, but for the purpose of securing themselves a fairly good commercial-credit standing with the banks in the community—to plow the whole $100,000 back, they have to pay 42½ percent in order to do it; and the "joker in the deck" is that you just cannot put 100 percent back.

You can put only 57½ percent back, because it takes $42,500 to pay the tax, for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Helvering, is not going to accept buttons, bananas, or beans for the tax. He wants real money. So why talk about corporations keeping an undistributed net of 100 percent? It just cannot be done—57½ percent is the limit. Now let us consider corporations that are in debt. Of course, they get some relief, so-called, when in debt. I understand that under the provisions in this bill they may amortize the debt of $100,000 over a period of years, and if I am wrong the gentleman from Kentucky will correct me. They can amortize that debt over a period of 5, 10, or 15 years.

If it is 5 years, the amount would be $20,000 a year, and they are taxed 22½ percent on the $20,000. Then that is subtracted from the original $100,000, and they start out on a new base of $80,000, and are taxed at the new rates on the balance. Of course, that is a relief from what they intend to do to them in this bill, but it is an addition of 7½ percent over what he has to pay under the present law. That is a good deal like hauling a fellow up to the block and chopping his foot off, handing him a crutch, and telling him that now he can go, that he is as good as new. Let us consider a business concern that has a debt and wants to pay in the manner here provided, or a concern that finds it necessary to plow their entire earnings back.

Here is another concern across the State line, 50 miles away, that makes the same kind of a commodity, in the same line of business, but they are more fortunate financially. They have a surplus, and there is no immediate necessity for their plowing this money back, and they can make a complete distribution if they wish. They will pay no tax, because we repeal the corporation tax and the excess-profits tax and the capital-stock tax. Certainly they have a material advantage as to production costs over the first-named corporation. In a sense, what this bill really does is just this: It develops a new type of regimentation of American business by compelling them to conform to a policy laid down by the Federal Government with pressure rates as a penalty that they would not do if it were left to the discretion and business judgment of the board of directors, the production managers, and the sales manager sitting in a conference discussing their problems.

In a word, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is almost impossible to make a yardstick that will apply to corporations; they differ so in character and differ so in their service. For instance, take a personal-service corporation with $250,000 in capital—we had such an instance—engaged in arranging tours for people all over the world. They have not more than 12 or 15 employees. Their work is done largely by transportation agencies with whom they do business. They supply them with their printed matter and their orders and everything of the sort. Here is another corporation with a $250,000 capital engaged in making a standard commodity for which there is a fairly stable demand throughout the year.

It is a manufacturing corporation. They have depreciation and obsolescence and workmen's compensation; they have tenement-house laws and State corporation tax; they have a multitude of problems that the other corporations are not troubled with at all. I think it is just as impossible to create a yardstick that will apply finally and fairly and equitably to corporations as a whole as it is to prepare a yardstick as is being made by the T. V. A. The only material suitable for such a yardstick would be rubber.

One of the speakers suggested to me what seemed to be evasion, the suggestion of getting the money back in by getting stock rights and paying it in after it has been through the tax mill. Professor Adams said to me once, and I think he coined the expression, that the great difficulty in writing tax bills was in trying to prevent loss of revenue through "legal avoidance" rather than "illegal evasion." I thought it was very well put. Those four words described it very clearly. I noticed that the speaker who mentioned that suggested that that would be in a sense legal avoidance, and some individuals might avail themselves of that opportunity and get the money back without paying the heavy rate that applies in this bill, 29½ and 42½ percent.

Another thing, while we may get the money the first year, although I am not so sure about it, I have been unable to get the figures from the proper source—I am reasonably sure that after this bill has been functioning for a year we are not going to get the money. I may be wrong. I have been wrong before. I was wrong when I made the prediction of returning prosperity in closing the debate for the Hawley-Smoot bill. I saw the sun of prosperity rising in the East, and the clouds of depression being dispelled, but I was no more in error than my opponents across the aisle, who figured that prices would be so high that people could not live and could not buy anything. Of course, just the reverse occurred. Prices fell so rapidly that manufacturers and farmers could not get the cost of production, so my Democratic friends were just as wrong as I was at the time. At least, mine was the happiest conclusion to come to. It had the merit of being optimistic, although I am a little afraid of optimism. A friend of mine said to me one day, "You are always optimistic." I said, "Yes; and you are inclined to be a pessimist when we are discussing matters." "But", he said, "I want to tell you this: I do not want to develop that degree of optimism that may class me as a cheerful idiot." [Laughter.]

Ever since then I have been rather chary about being too optimistic. Now, let us suppose we are stockholders in a corporation and we have $100,000 net, and they decide to keep $50,000. As I understand, that costs them 35 percent.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. My recollection is that the rate is 17½ percent if $50,000 is distributed.

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes; but I am talking about the part not distributed.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If you kept $50,000, I think the rate of 35 percent is correct.

Mr. CROWTHER. Now, it costs $35,000 to keep that in the business. That leaves $50,000 to distribute, minus the $35,000 tax, because, again, the tax commissioner is not going to take commodities; he demands real money.

Then when our statement comes in and we see that our $50,000 is depleted by $35,000 for the privilege of keeping half of it in the business, I do not know, but I think you will say with me, "I guess I will not stay in that business. I guess I will sell my stock in that company. I am not going to be in a business that depletes my dividend with a $35,000 tax for keeping half the money in the corporation.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman will agree that even the 20-percent rate is better than it was at one time when we had a tax upon a tax?

Mr. CROWTHER. We are indebted to the gentleman from Kentucky for the discovery and correction of that very grievous error.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. My friend will remember that at one time it was suggested that it was a tax upon a tax, but we have got away from that.

Mr. CROWTHER. I agree; but we still have multiple taxation, which I want to touch on a little later. I want to call attention a little later on to an article that I think will explain that. It is from an authority on finance and monetary affairs. I am astounded that somebody has not said something about it before. But, to return to my penalized stockholders, I think I would say, "I am going to go out and pick up a few tax-exempt securities. I am not going to stay with a company paying that rate for retaining 50 percent of the money with which to do business."

We still have tax exempts. They are being issued at the rate of a billion dollars a year. This administration has recommended against it. The previous administration recommended against it. As a matter of fact, they would be no great subject of revenue. As near as I can determine from a tax report by a man by the name of Hardy, we would probably have difficulty in raising over $75,000,000 in taxes from Federal tax-exempt securities unless we had an extremely high rate. But that is a lot of money and does not deserve to be called just chicken feed in these days. If we had that, in addition to another item that comes pretty near that amount, it would make about $150,000,000.

In considering a new tax bill we should consider the problem of the community property laws in eight States, which permits a husband and wife to make a separate return. A change in this policy has been strongly recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury of both parties; both Mr. Mellon and Mr. Morgenthau have suggested that some adjustment of that inequity should be made. A man and a woman in those eight States, being able to make a separate return, takes from the Government between $60,000,000 and $75,000,000 annually as a result of surtax avoidance. Of course, that is absolutely unfair. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] has a bill pending to change that condition, but we do not expect to have any action on it immediately.

EARLY TAX PROVISIONS

The first income-tax law was passed in 1862 and provided that all incomes below $600 were exempt. It carried a tax of 3 percent on incomes up to $10,000 and a tax of 5 percent on incomes above $10,000. This law was in effect for 10 years, being repealed in 1872.

In 1894 a new law was passed imposing a tax of 2 percent on incomes of over $4,000. This law was declared unconstitutional by the United States Supreme Court.

In 1909 an excise tax was imposed on corporations, computed at the rate of 1 percent "upon the entire net income over and above $5,000 received by it during the year." This tax was declared constitutional on the ground that it was an excise tax—not an income tax.

In 1913 the sixteenth amendment was adopted, giving Congress the power to levy an income tax without apportionment among the several States. A law was promptly passed levying a normal tax of 1 percent and a surtax of 1 to 6 percent. The exemption for a single individual was $3,000 and for a married person $4,000. The surtax began at $20,000. The corporation rate was continued at 1 percent, but the $5,000 exemption was dropped.

I ask permission to extend this short statement in my remarks, and merely state that it is from a paper that is rather friendly to the administration. I shall read only the closing paragraph:

In the meantime there is a way by which money could be raised, a simple way and a just way. That is a broadening of the base of the present income-tax structure, graduating upward from a very small assessment in the low brackets to a very high assessment in the upper. Such a revision should be sufficiently inclusive to make possible not only the collection of the sum immediately needed but also to make a start on a reduction of those invisible and unjust sales taxes which now constitute 70 percent of our Federal receipts, such a policy to be pursued, as times pick up and tax receipts increase, to a point where all, or at least nearly all, of our revenues are drawn from the visible, ability to pay, as distinct from hidden sources.

About 62 percent of our taxes now are indirect.

Is it too much to hope that such a substitution for the present muddling may be expected, even in an election year?

There is the rub; it is an election year; still, I do not think our people are afraid of taxes. I think the sooner the people of this country become tax-conscious, the better. A number of years ago we reduced the number; we made a change in the exemptions. I think in 1923 or 1924 we took nearly 2,000,000 people from the Federal tax roll—people who paid from $5 to $7.50, $10, or $12. Perhaps it cost a rather high percentage to collect this tax, but they were cognizant of the fact they were supporting the Federal Government; and I do not think you will find a man in this country unwilling to pay $5 or $10 a year in direct taxes.

I want to call to your attention a matter about which nothing has been said. I call attention to the tremendously high percentage rate that obtains between what is paid and what is held under the title of "Undistributed net."

To illustrate, let us take a corporation of $100,000 net income. If it retains $10,000 of that income, it will have to pay $4,000 in taxes. This is 40 percent of the amount retained. If it retains $20,000, its tax will be $9,000. This is $5,000 additional tax in order to retain a second $10,000 of earnings—a 50-percent tax on this second $10,000 retained. Another $10,000 retained will call for an additional tax of $6,000, or 60 percent. If the amount retained is more than 30 percent of the net income, the Government will take $1 in tax for each additional $1 retained.

That is a serious proposition when you study it out.

Such rates of tax are exceedingly heavy penalties for corporations to pay for amounts which they may have to use in their businesses or which they must retain for business needs.

Turning now to the schedule which applies to corporations with net incomes of $10,000 or less. Let us take the corporation with $10,000 of net income. If there is $1,000 of that income which it fails to distribute, it must pay $100 tax. If it retains a second $1,000, it must pay $250 additional tax. For a third $1,000 it must pay a tax of $400. On any further amounts retained beyond the 30-percent bracket it must pay a tax equal to 55 percent of the amount retained.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CROWTHER. I wish now for a moment to bring to your attention this article by Dr. Irving Fisher, which very clearly demonstrates that the proposed plan means not only double taxation but multiple taxation:

Last week's discussions of the administration's proposed new corporation tax, to replace the taxes now existing, at the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, became rather heated and attracted attention more for the heat displayed than for any new light thrown on the subject.

Winesses from the Treasury Department claimed that the new tax changes would be, if adopted, "the most important tax reform since the income-tax law." On the other hand, the United States Chamber of Commerce complained that it would "mean more tax complexities and not simplification", would "increase tax litigation", "would present grave administrative difficulties", and that the plan "in its main outlines has been rejected in countries with greater experience in the levying and collection of income taxes"; that "in exhaustive reports of successive British commissions there was rejection of various plans of graduated earnings on corporations" because "the yields would be uncertain and the methods of preventing increased avoidance and evasion ineffective."

The new proposal is to tax corporate "adjusted net income", both the part distributed in dividends and the part undistributed at the same rate, but that rate to be on a sliding scale according to how large the part undistributed is compared to the part distributed.

"If there is no undistributed net income, there shall be no tax." From this zero point the rate rises to 42½ percent "if the undistributed net income is 57½ percent of the adjusted net income" (unless that net income is below $10,000).

In a former article I have presented such arguments in favor of this proposal as seemed to me sound. In this article I will stress the arguments on the other side.

There seem to me two main economic arguments against this radical proposal. One is that it unduly stimulates the distribution of dividends, even when the stockholders would prefer to "plow back" in order to let the company grow as it ought to grow, in their interest as well as for the good of the Nation. This has been sufficiently brought out by others.

The second argument against the proposal seems to be entirely overlooked in the discussion at Washington and in the report of the subcommittee of the House of Representatives Committee on Ways and Means.

This is that so far as there would be any undistributed income, it would not really be taxed at the same rate as the distributed income, but at a much higher rate, despite all opinions and intentions to the contrary.

The reason is that all income undistributed, being "plowed back", is no longer income. It is addition to surplus, which is addition to capital.

Therefore any tax on undistributed profits is a capital levy just as truly as would be a tax on the original capital to which these profits are being added.

Now, any capital levy is double taxation if the income from that capital is also taxed.

During the World War Germany and some other countries levied high taxes on capital as an emergency measure. If a capital of $100,000, yielding, say, 5 percent, or $5,000 a year, is taxed 20 percent, then $20,000, or one-fifth of the capital, is handed over to the Government. The remaining $80,000 will then yield at 5 percent only $4,000 a year instead of $5,000, a loss of $1,000 a year forever. This loss of income is the real burden to the owner of that capital of $100,000.

But a second burden is added if, besides that levy on the parent capital, there is also a 20-percent tax on its offspring, the income from it. A tax of 20 percent on the remaining $4,000 a year would reduce it still further—to $3,200, that is, by $800. This with the first $1,000 makes an annual tax of $1,800 out of the $5,000 originally yielded by the capital. This makes, in all, 36 percent. That is, to tax the parent capital 20 percent and, in addition, to tax the income from it 20 percent is, in effect, the same as taxing the income 36 percent. In fact it is is worse, for an income tax of 36 percent would not continue indefinitely whereas the 20 percent on capital means a loss of 20 percent on the income forever. It is irrevocable.

Now let us see how this applies to the new proposal. A company which adds to its capital $100,000 of "undivided profits", or so-called "undistributed net income" (a misleading name), and pays nearly the highest rate, say 40 percent, is depriving its stockholders thereby of 40 percent of their income from said $100,000 for all time. In other words, it is virtually prepaying a perpetual 40 percent tax to be borne by the stockholders on the income from the $100,000.

That should be enough. But in addition to this virtual 40 percent tax on that income they will, until the tax law is repealed, have to pay another 40 percent tax on what is left. This 40 percent on the 60 percent left is $24,000 (24 percent of the $100,000) so that the total tax will amount to 64 percent!

Nor is this the utmost possible. It would be such if all the future income from the $100,000 (or rather from what is left of it) is distributed. But let us suppose it is not distributed. Then, by repeating the above reasoning, we see that we shall have not simply double taxation but triple taxation. First the capital levy prepaid a perpetual 40 percent tax on the future income from the $100,000. Then what is left of that future income is to be taxed 40 percent. And now we are supposing that this remainder is to be undistributed, that is, is to be doubly taxed itself. And so on indefinitely.

What then will ultimately be left of the $100,000 or its future income? After the first tax of 40 percent the remainder will be 60 percent out of that income. But in view of the future 40 percent tax on that remainder, only 60 percent of that 60 percent will be left, or 36 percent. And if said remainder is undistributed, and so its income in turn is taxed 40 percent, we have left up to that stage only 60 percent of 60 percent of 60 percent, which is 21.6 percent. And so on indefinitely.

The remainder may be whittled away to 1 percent if the tax of 40 percent is unrepealed and if the corporation keeps on indefinitely "plowing back" the income from that $100,000—for the benefit of the Government. In that case the tax becomes virtually a 99-percent tax, consisting of 40 percent paid in advance and the rest in the future.

Moreover, this double, triple, quadruple, quintuple, etc., taxation will absorb the full 99 percent and more, whatever the rate of taxation, if the system lasts long enough. If the lowest rate, 10 percent, be used, we still find that 90 percent of 90 percent of 90 percent, etc., will whittle down to less than 1 percent if we keep on far enough.

In short, a tax on undivided profits, as long as they and their progeny remain undivided, is multiple taxation of the extremest kind possible.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. On the question of the withholding of undistributed net earnings going to surplus and thereby backing capital, I remind the gentleman that under our present system if dividends are declared out of accumulated earnings they are taxable as income in the hands of stockholders.

So that is not in accord with the principle announced by the authority to which the gentleman referred.

Mr. CROWTHER. I wish the gentleman would read this carefully, because I am quite certain he will agree with the conclusions of Dr. Fisher. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield such time as he may care to use to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, today when the tax bill is under consideration, I intend to discuss a subject that is intimately and inseparably related to taxation, and that is debt and the bureaucracy that fosters and creates debt.

A NOBLE CONCEPT OF GOVERNMENT

Whatever may be said of the economic wisdom of the large expenditures under the New Deal—and I have opposed many of them—no one will deny that the President's heart beats in rhythm with the heartbeats of 127,000,000 people. In his encircling love for humanity he is motivated by the same concept that prompted Jefferson to write into the great Declaration the precious doctrine that "all men are created equal." His political creed is the Jeffersonian philosophy of all-embracing benevolence adapted to this modern age. It is the philosophy of the more abundant life—not more abundant for a few but more abundant for all. It is the philosophy that exalts nobility and unselfishness. It is the philosophy that says:

I do not want anything that everybody else cannot have.

It is the philosophy that regards America as one great family, at whose table is always spread a feast of love and whosoever will may come. It is the philosophy which teaches that we should manifest an interest in people, not for the purpose of exploiting them but for the purpose of assisting them to higher and happier levels of living; that we should love our fellow men for what we can do for them and not, as the exponents of special privilege would have it, for what we can squeeze out of them. It is the philosophy which teaches that the concern of this Nation should be to see that the average citizen prospers; that however hard and drab may be the surroundings of boys and girls in whose breasts a righteous ambition burns, they shall have a chance to grow into the larger life; that their God-given right to reach the full stature of useful manhood and womanhood and to enjoy the fruits of honest toil shall not be barred or abridged by privileged statutes and practices that rob them of their birthright before they have fairly started on life's journey.

It is the philosophy which recognizes the eternal truth that a hickory shirt or calico dress may cover a heart as pure and true as any that beats beneath purple and fine linen; that virtue dwells as often in hovels as in palaces. That was the concept of Jefferson, the incomparable humanitarian who founded the Democratic party, and that is the concept of Franklin D. Roosevelt, who has done more than any other President since Jefferson to erect in America the ideals of a great democratic Commonwealth.

BACK TO ECONOMY AND SIMPLICITY

Having written into the statutes his principles of social justice the President, if I interpret his thought and purpose correctly, is now willing to lead the country back to the ancient moorings of economy and simplicity in government, thus pointing the way to a reduction in tax burdens. In reaching these conclusions I hope and believe that I am not taking too much as granted. I draw these deductions from his move to reorganize the executive agencies and from his very marked efforts to taper off expenditures.

Mr. Chairman, with all of the earnestness I can command I appeal to Members of Congress to stand by the President of the United States in all of his efforts to curb bureaucracy and introduce economy in government and not to thwart him, as has been done in several striking instances recently.

The Government has gone altogether too far into the realm that should be occupied by private business and industry. It must abdicate these premises and return to its normal function if we are to see happy days again in this country. In recognizing that this unhealthy condition must terminate, the President has shown the vision of a statesman. It is the duty of Government to encourage honest industry, but not to compete with it.

The President has lately given some positive evidence that he regards the period of heavy spending as over and as being convinced that the time of retrenchment has come. Will the Congress support him in a reversal of the spending program, or will it insist on a continuance of enormous expenditures over the President's opposition? I hope it will sustain the President and cooperate with him in every move he makes to shear bureaucracy of its malign powers and to reduce the cost of government so as to ease the burden of debt and taxation which now bears so heavily on our people. I profoundly believe not only that the road to recovery runs in that direction but that retrenchment is vitally necessary to save America from financial collapse and chaos, possibly from serious social convulsions or actual revolution.

The President has shown he is alive to the evils of bureaucracy by the steps he has taken to set up a body to make a study of the reorganization of government, with a view to eliminating overlapping of activities and reducing overstuffed personnel. His recent letter to Speaker BYRNS on that subject was a most hopeful indication.

In his relief message to Congress on March 18 the President laid down some very sound and salutary principles when he spoke of the desirability of getting the Government out of employment relief and transferring that responsibility to industry, where it belongs. He spoke wisely and patriotically when he said:

It is the task of industry to make further efforts toward increased output and employment, and I urge industry to accept this responsibility. I present this problem and this opportunity definitely to the managers of private business, and I offer in aid of its solution the cooperation of all the appropriate departments and agencies of the Federal Government.

SOME DISQUIETING MANIFESTATIONS

All of this is laudable in the highest degree and I only hope that Congress will strike hands with the President and help him to carry out this change in program. It is not my purpose to scold my congressional colleagues, whom I love and respect, or to deliver any unwelcome homilies, but this is a matter of unusual importance and as friends of our country we should reason together. There have been some disquieting manifestations recently, which indicate that our lawmaking body may not be keen to apply the economy brakes and that, I think, is deplorable. When the President sought to reduce the cost of the Civilian Conservation Corps in the sum of $68,500,000 and to take 50,000 trainees off of the backs of the hard-pressed taxpayers, a ruction in this House of Representatives forced him to beat a retreat. I believe that the Civilian Conservation Corps is one of the best features of the New Deal and that training in these camps is character building, but I could not see my way clear to antagonize the President in this matter, because I believe a reduction in expenditures all along the line will facilitate national recovery and that a return to normalcy and the opportunities which normal prosperity will bring will be best for the young as well as for all.

Another action in Congress that is strikingly out of gear with the President's efforts for economy and, I think, very ill-advised, is the effort being made at the other end of the Capitol to pass over the Presidential veto the bill appropriating $50,000,000 for seed loans during the year 1936. Although the President in his veto message stated that he has balances on hand ample to meet all the legitimate demands for these loans, the Senate Committee on Agriculture has decided by an overwhelming vote to move to override the Presidential veto and thus make a wholly unnecessary appropriation of $50,000,000 out of a bankrupt Treasury. In times like these, with the people groaning under debt and taxes, what could be more inexcusable? Our tax-ridden citizens are going to agree with the President, who said in his veto message that "a special appropriation by the Congress at this time for this purpose is both inadvisable and unnecessary."

TREASURY-POST OFFICE BILL RUNS AMUCK

Even more distressing as a symptom of congressional indifference toward retrenchment is the action taken by the other body on the Post Office and Treasury Departments' appropriation bill. I happen to be chairman of the subcommittee in charge of that bill in the House. In drafting the bill we members of the subcommittee had constantly before us the vision of a sorely tax-ridden people; of an enormous national debt beyond the power of the human mind to conceive. In such circumstances we believed that economy is the imperative need of the times and that vast extensions of existing services and large accretions of costly personnel, however such adventures might be justified when conditions are normal, should await the coming of better times. We not only refused these great additional charges on the Treasury but with the most meticulous care we cut out of the appropriations estimated for every dollar that was not absolutely needed to maintain regular operations. We labored week after week, and finally we produced a bill which from the first page to the last reflected the strictest economy.

What happened when the bill reached the other end of the Capitol? The other body restored the excesses, and threw economy to the winds. To have been entirely consistent, the upper branch of Congress should have sent a committee to the bureau chiefs of the two departments to inquire if there was anything more they wanted.

FEDERAL REGISTER NOT THE PRESIDENT'S BABY

It is popular among critics of the spending policies of the administration to point the accusing finger at the President, but as a Member of Congress I am not going to say that our lawmaking body is entirely free from blame for some of the excessive expenditures, and candor compels the admission that a few shafts of criticism may well be aimed at the House of Representatives. The Federal Register, for instance, is not a brain child of the President nor can it claim the excuse of having a wild-eyed professor for its parent. It was born in the House of Representatives of very excellent parentage, and having miraculously and unfortunately escaped asphyxiation in infancy, it has developed into a lusty and overgrown youngster that eats $263,320 of the taxpayers' money every year and cries for more. This remarkable publication is issued 5 days a week and costs more than $1,000 for every day it is issued. The receipts from subscriptions amount to virtually nothing, and the publication, according to my information, is as valueless as a last year's bird's nest, but it has brought a nice little addition to the bureaucratic family in the shape of a new division with a personnel of 15 well-paid employees and a pay roll of $38,320 per annum. This division assembles the copy and the remainder of the cost is for work done at the Government Printing Office.

One of the interesting experiences of my journalistic career was my employment as a writer on a full-fledged Indianapolis newspaper that lasted 3 years and then turned up its toes to the daisies. It was a marvel while it lasted and was known all over the country as a model daily newspaper, but it could not stand the gaff, and the publisher lost $300,000 in his ill-starred enterprise. If the comparatively small and insignificant Federal Register continues in existence 3 years, it will sink not $300,000 but more than three-quarters of a million dollars of the taxpayers' money. So in this instance, at least, the President can say, "Shake not thy gory locks at me." It was the House of Representatives and not the White House that incubated the Federal Register, and, with all due respect to the worthy motives that brought it into existence, it should be abolished at the earliest possible moment.

And it is in the House, too, that a proposal is now being discussed to superimpose on the President's new relief appropriation of $1,500,000,000 the additional sum of $700,000,000 for another Public Works Administration program. I hope that will not be done.

If I had any powers of persuasion, I would beg the proponents of this idea not to pursue their plans further. We have too many half-baked public-works projects already on the way sapping the Federal Treasury and straining to the breaking point the local political divisions that cannot afford to keep up the payments to which they have obligated themselves.

TIME FOR ECONOMY IS NOW

If there ever was a time when the Congress of the United States should stand for a reduction in the cost of government, that time is now. If there ever was a time when the Congress of the United States should make an earnest, determined effort to curb and reduce the enormous, domineering bureaucracy that rides this country like a colossus, that time is now.

If there ever was a time when we should take steps to abolish excessive and useless governmental personnel in order to remove a horde of tax-eating parasites from the backs of the long-suffering people who have to bear the burdens of government, that time is now. My main purpose in arising today is to plead with my colleagues in Congress to give serious thought to the disastrous consequences that are certain to follow unless we put a check on unbridled bureaucracy and stop the drains on the Federal Treasury.

When I think of the bureaucracy that has fastened itself on this country during the last few decades and how its ever spreading tentacles have reached out into the lives of our people, to interfere with private business and domestic concerns and grab the revenues that should be bestowed as rewards for individual initiative and toil, I am reminded of the fabled Briarius, who had 300 hands, and each hand had an itching palm to clutch the fruits of honest industry.

THE WATCHWORD OF OUR STATESMEN

For a hundred years economy was the watchword of our statesmen. For a hundred years "We demand retrenchment in the cost of government" was a full, resounding phrase that was featured and exploited in every political platform of every political party, National, State, and local, as the greatest of all desiderata. Political action lost all of its beneficent essence unless it was associated with economy. The hardy pioneers of America knew how they earned every dollar, and they would not tolerate any outcropping of extravagance on the part of their public servants. John Adams was almost driven out of public life when he paid $40 from the Public Treasury for a mirror, which still adorns the Vice President's room in the United States Capitol. From its place on the wall it looks down on all comers, a silent reminder of the era that antedated the soft and easy life, the era when thrift was the dominant national characteristic and America was yet to become acquainted with the blissful experience of a staggering national debt.

The time was when economy was cherished as a national aim and objective; when those of our Senators and Representatives who proved themselves the most loyal and devoted to "government, economically administered"—a phrase much in vogue and embalmed in every political platform in those days—were considered the most virtuous of our public servants. In the era when the foundations of the Nation were being laid deep and strong by these hardy and far-seeing forbears, economy was a virtue to which every public man stood pledged by the immutable demands of public opinion, and the slightest deviation from which meant death to personal ambition.

PRESTO, A MARVELOUS CHANGE

And then, Mr. Chairman, a change came over the spirit of our dreams. The metamorphosis of thought and conduct that followed will forever remain one of the strangest, as well as one of the most marked, developments of our national existence. If the change that has come over our public men has made them less regardful of the time-honored principles of economy, is it not fair to them and entirely reasonable to believe that it is the reflection of a laxness that had already developed among the masses of the people, a sort of projection of the mass psychology into the legislatures, the Congress, and the ruling places of America?

I for one am not going to hold Members of Congress exclusively responsible for what occurred. An inexplicable change in public opinion seems to have been at the root of the metamorphosis. Members of Congress began to be judged not by the amount of money they could save for the taxpayers by rigid economy but by the amount they could contrive by hook or crook to extract from the Federal Treasury for the benefit of their home districts. The larger the amount of "spoils" the Member could thus obtain the greater his popularity thrived and bloomed in his home bailiwick. Blocs were organized to facilitate these center rushes on the Treasury and Members of Congress who declined to play ball with the blocs were shuffled into the discard. Blocs that were not strong enough individually to accomplish these raids entered into hog combinations with other blocs—and the Treasury be damned. The welfare of the Nation as a whole was lost sight of in this game of grab.

Various blocs and special interests opened headquarters at Washington to secure additional leverage on the Treasury. Commissions and bureaus were created in numberless extent and infinite variety to serve these special interests in their efforts to siphon the Treasury. The cost of Government shot upward like the index at a gas-filling station.

Over in the Library of Congress there is a most interesting volume entitled "List of Federal Commissions, Committees, Boards, and Similar Bodies Created During the Period From September 14, 1901, to March 4, 1929." That book contains 147 closely printed pages devoted entirely to listing the titles of the commissions, and so forth, that had been created up to March 4, 1929. I shudder to think of the number that have been created since that time.

Bureaucracy is not a product of either political party alone but of both. The longest arm in America, the arm capable of the farthest reach in striking down that parasitic and un-American outgrowth of Government, is the arm of President Roosevelt—and more power to his arm. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, there is some compensation in belonging to a political organization that is absolutely independent. I have not been seen about this bill, and no one has talked to me about it, but I have tried to read and understand it. I have gone through the report published in the hearings in connection with this bill, and whatever I have to say on the bill I am wholly responsible for myself.

The purposes for which revenue is asked under the bill are:

First. Five hundred million dollars annually to take care of payments under the new A. A. A. bill.

Second. One hundred and twenty millions annually for the next 9 years to amortize the adjusted-compensation legislation.

Third. Five hundred and seventeen millions spread over the next several years to take care of the actual and anticipated deficit occasioned for the years 1936 and 1937 occasioned by the noncollection and refunding of impounded portions of the processing taxes.

This means, first, six hundred and twenty million of additional annual revenues and five hundred and seventeen millions in temporary revenues to be spread over the next 2 or 3 years.

It was never my plan to institute the A. A. A. program. I never favored the principle of scarcity in a land with starving people. I never favored paying the farmers a dole and abandoning the better principle of giving them parity in price. I never advocated a program that pays millions to large operators and hands merely a few sheckels to the average farmer of the Nation. I never favored a system for farmers that takes away their own independence and destroys self-reliance. But this administration did favor those things which I did not. The new A. A. A. bill has been passed and signed; it is the law. Farmers are carrying on their operations under it; they have been promised benefits; they have so contracted. What shall we do now? Shall we say to them we held out this new hope to you in our legislative act, but we have no money with which to make good our promise unless we issue interest-bearing tax-free bonds? So far as I am concerned, we will make our promise good and provide the money with which to make the payments. That much is my responsibility as a member of Congress. The administration can take the responsibility of passing the new A. A. A. act which I strenuously opposed.

One hundred million dollars annually is needed to amortize the payments of the soldiers' adjusted-compensation certificates. It was not my plan to pay the soldiers in this way. It was my plan to substitute currency in place of the certificates, and if that had been done no damage would have resulted. It would have cost us nothing. The new currency would have been backed by the Government's own outstanding certificates. It would not have been inflation; it would have been replacement of lost circulation, resulting from a period of ruthless deflation. This administration did not believe in these principles; they passed the present act directing that the soldiers should be paid, but the administration did not provide the means by which the payments were to be made. What shall we do now? Shall we fool the soldiers again and say we passed an act to pay you, but we have not the money, except through issuing more tax-free interest-bearing bonds? For one, I refuse to permit this Government to make a promise to the defenders of this country and then fail in carrying out that promise. It is my responsibility now to provide the means by which the soldiers are to be paid; it is the administration's responsibility for not providing a better method of doing the same thing.

Five hundred and seventeen millions will be necessary to take care of the A. A. A. contracts already in existence—contracts which farmers have signed and under which they have performed their part of the contract. Shall this Government escape this liability merely because the act was unconstitutional? These contracts should be liquidated—the Government must keep its word with the farmers. That is my responsibility as a Member of this Congress. The responsibility for passing any such law in the first place rests with this administration.

In searching for more taxes it is the object of this legislation to ferret out and tax that property which under the present income-tax laws escapes taxation; in other words, it is an attempt to put a stop to tax evasions which are known to exist.

This act in general supersedes the present corporation income, capital-stock, and excess-profits tax on corporations. In lieu thereof this act proposes an income tax based upon the proportion of corporate earnings retained by the corporation.

The principles of equity in taxation under this act will be maintained for the following reasons: First, corporations and partnerships will be treated alike; second, a great source of tax evasion will be eliminated; third, to balance the Budget other than for the deficit created for relief purposes; fourth, the most important step which this act takes in equity in taxation is to base the tax on two important considerations—(a) the size of the corporation income; (b) the proportion of the corporation's net earnings that may be retained in its business.

If the earnings are distributed, there will be no tax, for the reason that if they are distributed the stockholder will pay the tax according to graduated surtaxes as now provided. All the Government is trying to do in this regard is to collect the tax, which under the present law it has a right to tax, but which it does not get by reason of tax evasion.

The Government will have the tax evaders "coming and going", whereas today they have them "going", but not "coming."

That the proposed tax will come from those most able to pay taxes can be illustrated by the following:

INCOMES OF $4,000 TO $5,000

Present law for 1936, 317,000 individuals are taxable; under this act, 26,000 additional individuals would be taxable.

Present law, amount taxable, $1,600,000,000; this act, $129,000,000 additional.

INCOMES OF $100,000 TO $150,000

Present taxable income, $253,000,000; this act, $365,000,000 additional; present law, 2,103 are taxable; this act, 2,876 additional are taxable.

These figures prove conclusively that those who are now most able to bear the burden of taxation are escaping it. Those having incomes of $100,000 to $150,000 are evading taxes to the extent of 57 percent in number of persons and to the extent of 59 percent of their taxable property in their class. Of those in the ordinary class, only 7.8 percent are evading taxes, to the extent of 7½ percent of their taxable property in their class.

INCOMES FROM $300,000 TO $500,000

Present taxable incomes, $140,000,000; this act will add $317,000,000 additional; present law, 375 individuals are taxable; under this act, 786 additional individuals will be taxable.

In this class 67 percent of the individuals are escaping taxation and to the extent of 69 percent of the property of their class.

INCOMES FROM $1,000,000 OR MORE

Present taxable income, $185,000,000; this act will add $607,000,000 additional; present law, 86 individuals are taxable; under this act, 212 additional individuals will be taxed.

In this class 71 percent of the individuals are escaping taxation to the extent of 76 percent of the property in their class.

These tables are based upon the Budget estimates and should be proof enough of where the proposed tax is to come from. It is coming from those abundantly able to pay the tax and from those who also have been abundantly able to escape taxation.

I can see no political issue in this measure. Those who have been in the custom of evading taxes so long that it has become a habit are hard to wean. Whenever the people have ever made any attempt to require them to do equity their only weapon of defense has been to shout, "This proceeding will destroy business." We have heard that before, but this time, I hope, this call for the want of a reason will not disturb this Congress in proceeding to do justice to the American taxpayers.

The present law discriminates against stockholders with small incomes because of the flat tax. Under the new plan, should the earnings be distributed and the total income of the individual fall under the lower brackets, he would pay the normal tax of 4 percent or no tax at all, according to the size of his income.

The tax will come from the upper income groups. It has been estimated that if the 1936 earnings of corporations were distributed the taxable income of individuals would be increased by $4,000,000,000.

Seventy-one percent would be received by individuals whose net income would be more than $25,000 annually.

Forty-five percent would be received by individuals whose net income would be more than $100,000 annually both classes being individuals who are subject to higher surtax rates.

This act adds no new taxes; all it does is to attempt to get that which the Government is already entitled to.

Corporations will in the future, as in the past, be allowed deductions for depreciation, depletion, obsolescence, bad debts.

This law is not changed, and no one can say that corporations are not fairly treated in regard to these deductions. For the years 1930–33 these deductions amounted to barely less than 50 percent of the total net income.

The act provides for one schedule for corporations whose net incomes are less than $10,000 and another schedule for corporations whose net income is more than $10,000. Under this act a small corporation could retain 30 percent of its earnings in surplus and be actually taxed less than it is now.

On this 30 percent retained the corporation would pay 7½ percent, 13 percent if it retained 40 percent. Under the present law the corporation would pay more than 13 percent in the following taxes: First, corporation income; second, capital-stock tax; third, excess-profit taxes.

Also bear in mind that of all the corporations proposed to be taxed under this act, more than 80 percent of them have net incomes of $10,000 or less.

There is no attempt in this act to treat large corporations unfairly as all could carry 30 percent of their earnings as surplus, without paying as much tax as they do under the present law. It is only in cases where large corporations carry more than 30 percent that this act will step in.

There can be no merit in the contention that the act will not yield substantial revenue, because if not distributed the corporation will pay it; and if distributed to avoid the tax, the individual stockholder in the higher bracket will pay it in surtaxes, which he is not doing now.

Assuming that no new currency will be issued to pay the adjusted-compensation certificates, that the new A. A. A. is to be continued, and that parity of prices to the farmer is to be abandoned, and assuming that there is no other way to take from those who acquired the process taxes as a gift, the money that actually belongs to the producer and the consumer, I will now unhesitatingly support this bill.

I will support it for another reason independently of all the considerations I have mentioned. I will support it because it is an attempt to bring about justice in taxation. It is an attempt to make those pay taxes who are the most able to pay, those who have the most ability to pay; it is an attempt to round up the tax evaders of this country and make them bear their fair share of the expense of government, regardless of whether we need this revenue for any of the purposes mentioned in this debate.

In concluding what I have to say in behalf of this measure, let me say that I have always been an advocate of "justice and equity in taxation." Years ago I hoped the day would come when the principle could be realized. With abrupt suddenness that day seems to be here. There are many reasons for it, but the principal one is that we have stuck to the principle of "special privilege for the few and a denial of equal opportunities to the many" so long that in truth and in fact the Government is bankrupt, the States are bankrupt, municipalities and most individuals are bankrupt. Not a single one of the group could pay its liabilities if demands were made. Those at the top have thus far escaped. They have been the beneficiaries of this "special privilege." They are the only ones who have any liquid money left, and now they must come in and take their places in the ranks of the common taxpayers of the Nation.

I am positive that if the ordinary people of this country had any money left, or property upon which they could raise money, that the ones "at the top" would yet escape. In the long course of time the deed returns to the doer. The unequal distribution of wealth brought about by an unfair division between labor and capital has concentrated the wealth of the Nation in the hands of a relatively few persons. Since they now have it, and since we must have money to carry on the business of Government, that same Government which permitted these few to enrich themselves, we must now turn to these "privileged few" and ask them to support the Government.

No thinking person can imagine that the people of this country will forever be content with letting a few individuals, through some special privilege, accumulate the wealth of the Nation in their hands while the great mass of the people remain destitute. This depression has brought out the truth of this statement.

During this depression, and more recently, we have seen the people of this Nation rally behind three great movements, and it is no exaggeration to say that fully 70,000,000 people have been associated with one or more of these movements. I refer to the share-the-wealth program carried forward by that dynamic leader, Huey P. Long; I refer to the Townsend movement launched by Dr. Francis Townsend, of California; I refer to the National Union for Social Justice under the leadership of the Reverend Father Coughlin, of Detroit, one of the most fearless and best-informed leaders this country has ever seen in action. These movements are the expression of the great mass of the American people, who are dissatisfied with the old order and demand social justice.

While the leaders of these great mass movements may be cataloged by the press of special privilege as demagogues and possessing unsound theories and doctrines of government, yet all must admit that the number of people in this country who believe in them far outnumber the people who do not. Again experience through the years has demonstrated that in the long run the people can be trusted. As a group it takes them a long time to arrive at some common united action, but when they do they create a public opinion based upon experience of life and not based on the headlines in the privileged press.

Regardless of what we may argue and contend, the philosophies found in these three movements are being realized with dramatic swiftness. We are expressing it in this present bill. In the platform of the National Union for Social Justice we find this statement:

I believe in broadening the base of taxation founded upon the ownership of wealth and the capacity to pay.

In this bill we are sharing the wealth; we are doing social justice, and one of the greatest forward steps this Government can take today in taxation is to demand that in the support of this Government those best able to share the burdens of government shall do so. That is what this bill does—it breaks down the barriers of special privilege and takes from those who are abundantly able to pay that just share of the expense of government which they equitably should pay, but which they have heretofore avoided.

I congratulate the Ways and Means Committee, and especially its able and learned chairman, in bringing before this Congress the most just tax measure since the Civil War. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12395) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

JAMES MURPHY MORGAN

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7253) for the relief of James Murphy Morgan, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to James Murphy Morgan, of Miami, Ariz., the sum of $10,000, and to Blanche Copelan, of Claypool, Ariz., the sum of $750. Such sums shall be in full settlement of all claims against the United States for permanent personal injuries, medical expenses, property damage, and loss of wages sustained by the said James Murphy Morgan and Blanche Copelan when they were injured in an automobile collision with a United States owned truck (Civilian Conservation Corps truck) near Claypool, Gila County, Ariz., on November 18, 1934: Provided, That no part of the amounts appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claims. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claims, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COINAGE OF 50-CENT PIECES IN COMMEMORATION OF THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF FOUNDING AND SETTLEMENT OF NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 10489, an act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding and settlement of the city of New Rochelle, N. Y., with Senate amendments.

The Senate has amended the bill and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] offered an amendment which was adopted. I wish to amend it by striking out "1936" and inserting "1938" and striking out "5" and inserting "25."

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Such coins may be disposed of at par or at a premium by such committee, and the net proceeds shall be used by it in defraying the expenses incidental and appropriate to the commemoration of such event.

"SEC. 3. All laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same, regulating and guarding the process of coinage, providing for the purchase of material, and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of coins, for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting, for the security of the coins, or for any other purposes, whether such laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein authorized."

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLARD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1 of the Senate amendment, strike out the word "five" and insert "twenty-five."

The amendments were agreed to.

KEEPING FAITH WITH THE UNITED STATES

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on Puerto Rico.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House, under date of April 23 Senator TYDINGS, of Maryland, introduced in the Senate S. 4529, on the question of independence for Puerto Rico.

This bill has created considerable agitation, protests, and controversy in Puerto Rico.

I feel it my duty to call the attention of the House to the effect that the passage of such a bill would have on the life and future of our loyal American citizens of Puerto Rico, and for this reason I desire to address the House.

Senator TYDINGS' "cyclone bill", providing for a referendum in Puerto Rico on the question of independence, will not devastate, nor will it destroy, summarily the lives and homes of the innocent as is the case with natural cyclones, but this "cyclone bill" has stirred up impetuously and profoundly the sentimental, moral, and spiritual fundamentals of the citizens of Puerto Rico that love our American institutions.

This "cyclone bill" represents a tremendous ingratitude and scorn to the majority of all citizens of the United States in the island that for 38 years have been fighting a thousand battles to obtain American liberties, cultivating and maintaining with absolute convictions, the principles and ideals of the democratic institutions of the United States of America.

This "cyclone bill" appears as though conceding certain determined liberties, but in its essence it tries to do away with all existing freedom and rights in Puerto Rico, throwing us into tragedy, fascism, and iniquity, without giving us the right to pass upon our own form of Government and imposing on us the exclusive vote for "independence."

The Tydings "cyclone bill" starts by destroying the sentiments of the people, demoralizing the American institutions in the island that for 38 years educated and guaranteed our public rights and the life of our people and will terminate by devastating the island economically to the satisfaction and delight of some individuals and material interests. It means ruin and desolation.

The argument that there exist groups in Puerto Rico favoring independence is not a reason why it should jeopardize the rights of the majority of the people that have maintained the sane and sincere doctrine of "permanent union of Puerto Rico with the United States."

It is the same as if by the mere fact that there now exist various groups in the Nation with communistic tendencies Senator TYDINGS should introduce a bill to determine by a plebiscite if the United States should constitute itself into a Soviet Republic.

The "cyclone bill" of Senator TYDINGS is unjust, arbitrary, ingrate, and devastating for Puerto Rico.

It is indeed very deplorable and regrettable and an injury that without proper consultation with the majority of citizens of the United States in Puerto Rico, the Governor, the Legislature of Puerto Rico, and other constituted authorities of the island such a measure should have been introduced.

The American Federation of Labor has for many years helped to obtain freedom for the workers of Puerto Rico, the guaranty of public assembly, and the right to organize and better their economic and social conditions within the fold of our American institutions. The workers of the island are very grateful for all of this.

The "cyclone bill" of Senator TYDINGS is a destructive measure and certainly will bring about nothing but despair among the people who love the American democracy. The charges of fraud at the elections has the same weight with us as if because of electoral frauds and killings in some of the sections of continental United States it should be proclaimed that the American form of government does not work out well in the United States.

The people of Puerto Rico as a whole are no more responsible for the assassination of Colonel Riggs than the people of the United States for the assassination of the great Presidents Lincoln, McKinley, or any other great man of the Nation. Nor can it be forgotten the assassination of Mayor Cermak in Florida.

It is unfortunate for the island that since the affairs of Puerto Rico were transferred to the Department of the Interior and Dr. Ernest H. Gruening was made the head of the division in charge of the affairs of Puerto Rico, the island has felt the petty political activities from Washington that have been imposed upon the people of Puerto Rico in utter disregard of our organic act, approved by Congress in 1917, which granted us American citizenship after it had been requested time and again from Congress for many years by all parties and by all the people.

The United States, according to the "cyclone bill", is breaking faith with all those that have worked for American ideals in Puerto Rico and with all Governors that have constantly preached and advocated love to the American institutions.

The beautiful island of Puerto Rico which has made wonderful progress in all directions during the American regime, is one of the first customers of commodities of the mainland, and has had over three thousand millions of dollars of commerce with the United States the last 36 years, two-thirds of which has benefited business of the continent. The money sent for relief and reconstruction is practically a compensation to the people of the island, and of which money two-thirds reverted right back to the mainland again.

I suggest that Senator TYDINGS read the official documents of Governor Beverly and the Secretary of War regarding Puerto Rico, referring to our elections of 1932, where it is affirmed that said elections were legal, clean, and just.

NATIONAL FLOOD CONTROL DEMANDED BY INCREASING HAZARDS AND DESTRUCTION

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an address delivered by me on April 27, 1936, at the Thirty-first Annual Convention of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address, which I will deliver today in Washington, D. C., at the Thirty-first Annual Convention of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, to wit:

Through the centuries man has searched the continents for abundant waters. At the same time he has sought protection for life and property from uncontrolled waters. Those enjoying abundant waters are now and have always been subject to the perils of floods.

Nations have lost their civilizations because they have mismanaged their lands. China today is a victim of famine and of recurring disastrous floods largely as a result of land abuse and mismanagement.

In the New World there was a revolt against the economic restraints of the Old World. America had apparently inexhaustible resources. With the march of our civilization our national resources are being destroyed. The American attitude is to develop and to exploit. There has been expansion and development, but the policy of exploitation, unless corrected, will lead to the destruction of the natural resources of the country.

The soil has been robbed of its roots and of its grasses. The crust of the earth has lost much of its topsoil, the sod has been plowed, the timber has been cut, the forests have been cleared, the swamps have been drained, canals have been constructed, and rivers have been straightened. The floods come down on homes, farms, factories, and cities, especially in the great alluvial valley of the Mississippi River, in everincreasing volume.

Floods have been accentuated by the clearing of hills and mountains; the velocity of streams has been increased by the building of ditches and the construction of canals. Floods, sometimes caused by cloudbursts, are usually caused by unprecedented rainfall. Floods have not increased in frequency in recent years; snows and rains have been similar through the ages. There is system and regularity in the processes of Nature; floods may be no more frequent now, but because of the development, especially along the lower reaches of the Mississippi River, the floods are of longer duration and of greater magnitude. The works of man have contributed to the perils of floods.

Hernando De Soto found the Mississippi River in flood when he discovered the father of waters. The historian of his expedition gives the following first authentic account of a Mississippi flood in 1543. I quote from Vega:

"It was a beautiful thing to look upon; a sea where there had been fields, for on each side of the river the water extended over 20 leagues of land and all of this area was navigated by canoes and nothing was seen but the tops of the tallest trees."

There were great floods in the United States before the advent of the white man. There were floods before the land was cultivated or the forests cleared. De Soto, as I have stated, found the Mississippi River in flood in 1543; it was a vast inland sea with an average width of 50 miles and a length of 1,100 miles.

LaSalle found the Mississippi River out of its banks in 1684.

The Mississippi River gage at St. Louis in the great flood of 1844 had a higher reading than any flood since. But little timber had been cut, substantially no deforestation obtained in the upper Mississippi Valley or along the Ohio and Missouri Rivers. The soil was virgin and the forests were primeval.

CONSERVATION

I believe in the conservation of the soil, as well as the conservation of all of our national resources. A vast change has been made by draining the lowlands, the marshes, and the swamps; the timber resources of the country have been largely dissipated, the soil has been robbed, our national heritage has been squandered. Every generation should leave the soil as fertile as it was found.

I favor the policy of conservation, I believe in reforestation. There is no conflict between these measures and plans for flood control; they are worth while; they can stand on their merits. It is not necessary for those who advocate the conservation of national resources to maintain that the policy will result in the control of floods. Those who advocate reforestation and soil conservation as substitutes for flood-control measures deal in generalities; they fail to submit any data to show either the costs or results of soil conservation or reforestation as flood relief and control methods; they overlook the fact that long before the soil was depleted or the forests were wasted there were great floods along all of the rivers and streams in the United States. There is a proper place for the conservation of the soil, for the preservation of the land, and for the protection of our national resources. The land must be properly cultivated and properly managed, a long-range policy to preserve the public domain must be adopted. The policies are related to sound policies of flood control but soil conservation and flood control are by no means synonymous.

HAZARDS

The hazards of floods are more numerous and the destruction is greater than formerly. The population of the United States has increased from 3,000,000 to 125,000,000; the factories and fields of America surpass those of any other nation. Floods are therefore more destructive. Sometimes the loss of life is less but the damages are far greater. The Johnstown flood of 1889 came without warning; 2,200 lives were lost; the damages amounted to $10,000,000. In 1936 there were warnings; weather forecasts were accurate; the telephone, telegraph, and the radio enabled people to escape; moreover, the citizens of Johnstown made the reservoirs more secure and built their homes higher up on the hillside, but business and commerce obtained along the river and in the valley. The damages of the flood in 1936 amounted to $30,000,000, while less than a dozen lives in Johnstown were lost, but the poorer citizens lost more heavily as is always the case.

The Government is not an insurer of its citizens against the hazards of the elements. As has been truly said, we shall always have heat and cold, lightning and tidal wave, earthquake and tornado, flood and drought. It is not a province of the Government to undertake to reimburse its citizens for losses incurred as a result of the acts of God, but the Government is charged with responsibility for the welfare and security of its citizens. The Government is charged with the responsibility of rebuilding public works that are damaged or destroyed. The leading nations in all the ages, as a proper governmental function to promote the general welfare, have provided for public works. The improvement of rivers and harbors is of benefit to the entire Nation. There is the humanitarian responsibility to relieve citizens in distress; there is the obligation to provide for employment. Permanent and beneficial public works always contribute to the progress and advancement of the Nation.

PUBLIC OPINION

Public opinion has been focused upon flood control and flood prevention as national issues by the disastrous floods of recent years, and especially the past 2 years. In 1932, 1933, and 1935, there were excessive floods along the tributaries of the lower Mississippi River, including the St. Francis River in Arkansas and the Yazoo River in Mississippi. In 1935 there were enormous floods in the Finger Lake region in central and southern New York and northern Pennsylvania. These floods were largely the result of cloudbursts. In 1936 there were other disastrous floods in New York, Pennsylvania, and nine other States along the Atlantic seaboard and in New England. The melting of the snow of an unusually hard winter was supplemented by unprecedented rains. From March 18 to March 25, 1936, floods occurred in 11 States; 170 lives were lost and according to conservative estimates, property valued at $350,000,000 was destroyed. The damages were especially great in the Pittsburgh area and in the New England States.

FEDERAL INTEREST

Floods know no State lines; neither floods nor dust storms respect States' rights. Floods are not concerned with the capacity to pay of the citizen drowned, nor are they concerned with the ability to pay of the citizen whose property is destroyed.

Minor or local floods may be handled by local authorities, but general flood problems are beyond the capacity of the local interests to solve. Floods, especially on the larger rivers, are the destructive enemies of both life and property. Flood control along the navigable streams where diverse interests are involved is the proper function of the Federal Government. Many rivers are navigable and traverse two or more States. The Federal interest arises from general improvements, especially in interstate streams. State and local interests are unable to provide works made necessary by improvements in other States.

States and local interests are without the facilities to make thorough the studies and investigations required for flood control works along the larger streams and rivers. Drainage and flood-control works have been constructed at immense cost to the taxpayers of the Nation; investors in all parts of the country have bought bonds that were issued for the construction of the works. In many cases, because of inadequate engineering data and inability of the local interests to provide the necessary investigations, the works are utterly inadequate and losses have accrued to the people of the Nation. Sooner or later the losses from major floods must be absorbed by the Nation. For years it has been apparent that the public interests would be promoted by surveys and examinations of the rivers of the country.

The States and local interests have constructed levees and canals as flood-control works along many of the tributaries of the Mississippi River; levees have been built to protect farms and cities along the Wabash River in Indiana and Illinois. The Miami Conservancy District, with a system of detention reservoirs, protects Dayton and nine other Ohio communities from a repetition of the disastrous flood of 1913. Levee and drainage works have been constructed along the Illinois River, the Des Moines River, the upper Mississippi River, the Missouri River, the Arkansas, the White, and St. Francis, the Red, and the Yazoo Rivers. Levees and other improvements have been made along the lower Columbia River in Washington and Oregon and the Sacramento River in California.

A large amount of work has been done by the local interests throughout the United States. Approximately a billion dollars have been expended by the local districts; progress has been made in flood control but the problem is yet unsolved.

LESSONS

In 1900, 5,000 lives were lost and property valued at $17,000,000 was destroyed by the hurricane waves of the Gulf of Mexico at Galveston. For 30 years Galveston has been protected by a sea wall.

In 1908 Portsmouth, Ohio, at a cost of $750,000, constructed a concrete wall. While other cities in recent floods along the Ohio River were greatly damaged, Portsmouth was secure.

In Vermont the Winooski Dams justified their existence in the floods of New England in 1936. The valleys below were protected, while unprotected valleys in New England were greatly damaged.

Floods cannot be prevented, but they can be reasonably controlled.

HASTY LEGISLATION

As a result of recent floods, much hasty legislation is being advocated; inadequate and unworthy flood-control projects are being promoted. It is well to keep in mind that great floods are of rare occurrence. There is no need for undue haste in the adoption of flood-control measures; well-considered plans for every project should be perfected. On the other hand, where careful studies, surveys, and investigations have been made, where plans have been perfected, where the danger justifies, and where the benefits are evident, there is no excuse for delay. Adequate legislation in all such cases should be passed.

CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY

Congress has power to improve waterways for navigation and for interstate commerce. The commerce clause is not the only constitutional basis. The necessary and proper clause of the Constitution gives ample authority. There is power to provide for the general welfare and to make "all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers." If the end be legitimate, if it be within the scope of the Constitution, all means that are appropriate and plainly adapted and that are not prohibited are constitutional.

There is a difference between the power to appropriate and the power to regulate and control; moreover, the Constitution is broad enough and flexible enough to give to Congress, within its terms, authority to meet fundamentally changing conditions. The Constitution was made for society; man was not made for the Constitution. Under constitutional government, as under parliamentary governments, public opinion, thoroughly crystalized and considered, is a controlling factor in the interpretation of the Constitution.

But, there is no occasion for further discussion of constitutional authority. Congress has assumed jurisdiction for the control of floods. Congress has declared that flood control along the lower Mississippi River is a national problem and that the problem should be solved at the expense of the Nation.

Works for flood control have been constructed along the Tennessee, the Columbia, the Colorado, the Missouri, the Ohio, and the Monongahela Rivers. Congress has contributed to flood-control works along the Sacramento River, and at Lake Okeechobee, in the State of Florida.

SURVEYS

In response to well-considered public opinion, Congress has made provision for surveys of practically all of the rivers of the United States. The people are entitled to know the value of their natural resources. The investigations cover power, flood control, navigation, and irrigation.

The River and Harbor Act of January 21, 1927, and section 10 of the Flood Control Act of May 15, 1928, made provision for the most extensive waterways studies ever undertaken. These investigations were made in accordance with House Document 308, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session. They are generally referred to as "308 documents."

Some 220 rivers and their tributaries have been investigated; 64 of these streams are covered by both the act of 1927 and the act of 1928. The Federal Government has expended $10,300,000 in studies and reports. Substantially all of the surveys have been reported to Congress. The information contained in the reports is of incalculable value to the country.

The Corps of Engineers have investigated some 1,600 projects; the cost of construction amounts to $8,000,000,000. Economically, some of the projects investigated are not justified, but it is believed that 50 percent of the projects studied can be justified from an economic standpoint inasmuch as the benefits exceed the costs of construction. Some of the projects are justified for the protection of human life and for the social security of the people.

ENGINEERING

The science of flood-control engineering has not kept pace with flood-control problems. The schools and universities of the United States have neglected engineering courses to promote the teaching of flood-control engineering.

There are but few first-class textbooks on the economics of flood control. Flood measures involve social, legal, and economic aspects; they require scientific investigation and careful study; one treatment applies to alluvial rivers and another method obtains on nonalluvial streams. In all plans, damages and benefits should be equated. There are many differences respecting the measure of damages. It is difficult to estimate benefits. Generally, the benefits as determined by the courts offer the best criterion.

Cloudbursts often cause floods. This is especially so on smaller streams and rivers. No serious study has ever been made respecting floods caused by cloudbursts, but no area in the mountain or in the valley is immune from cloudbursts.

It would be economically unsound to build streets in the municipalities or highways in the country to protect against the cloudbursts that occur once in a century. It would be equally impracticable and unsound to construct flood-control works where the benefits do not justify as a result of cloudbursts that may come but once in three or four generations. The science of flood control must be perfected.

All floods are not attributable to the same causes. Some result from heavy snows, some from cloudbursts, but generally the cause of floods is unprecedented rainfall.

Rivers differ. All rivers do not have the same characteristics; they are of two general classes, alluvial and nonalluvial. The nonalluvial river is one that has excavated its channel; the alluvial river builds up its own valley. The nonalluvial river carries in its channel all or the greater portion of its floodwaters; it seldom has a serious flood problem. The alluvial river normally carries only a part of its floodwaters in its channel; it usually has a serious flood problem. The Mississippi River in its natural state in the latitude of Vicksburg has a discharge capacity of approximately 1,000,000 cubic feet per second. This is about one-half the ordinary flood and about one-third of the maximum probable flood. The Sacramento River, at a corresponding point, carries in its natural state about one-tenth of its maximum probable flood.

Because of the lack of scientific flood-control information, there are many opinions respecting floods that are neither sound nor supported by the facts. Engineers often do not have the technical knowledge; there is not sufficient data on topography, floods, or flood damages. Accurate plans for flood prevention in many cases are not available.

The Corps of Engineers of the United States have been studying floods for more than a hundred years; they have had more experience in flood-control prevention than any other engineers in the United States or, for that matter, in the world. The engineering school of the corps is an outstanding institution. It is fortunate for the people of the Nation that the surveys provided by Congress have been made by an impartial agency and by the most competent engineers. Plans are thus available for Congress or for any district or State that desires to initiate or construct flood-control projects.

METHODS

Generally speaking there are four methods of controlling floods. Of the four methods, levees are the surest and most commonly used. They hold the water off of the land and confine it to established channels of discharge.

The second method is to increase the slope or cross section of the natural channel by enlarging the discharge capacity by means of widening, deepening, and straightening the stream.

The third method involves the diversion from the main channel into auxiliary or emergency channels of the flood waters in excess of the carrying capacity of the main channel.

The fourth method proposes to hold back temporarily from the natural channels waters in excess of their natural discharge, in reservoirs along the watershed, with provision for the release of stored waters when and as it may be safe to carry them away in the natural channels.

LEVEES

Levees is the best known method of flood control; it is the only method that can be used alone to solve major flood problems; it is normally the most satisfactory and the least expensive method; other systems are aids to the levee method; it has obtained in all countries and it has been tried in all civilizations; it is especially applicable to alluvial rivers; in fact, it is the primary method of flood control along alluvial rivers.

Four thousand years before the discovery of the Mississippi River by De Soto in 1543, the Pharoahs built levees along the Nile.

In Italy the Poe had been controlled by levees prior to the year A. D. 1300.

Levees were constructed along the Danube, the Rhine, the Rhone, the Volga, and other European rivers before A. D. 1700.

Holland has built dykes to keep back the waves of the sea through the centuries. Long before the white man came to America Holland constructed dikes to reclaim lands and to protect the people from the waters of the ocean.

DREDGING AND CUT-OFFS

Dredging contemplates enlarging the stream capacity. Generally the costs are excessive. Again, channel straightening and channel shortening involve cut-offs across bends. In the lower Mississippi River there are cut-offs; they are still in the experimental stage; they give hope and promise of increasing the discharge capacity and lowering ordinary floods; they are most promising especially in minor floods, but their effect in major floods is still speculative; the results are problematical.

The experiments made indicate that marked benefits will result but generally deepening and shortening alluvial streams will not solve the problem of floods. Nature has a way of restoring the equilibrium of its rivers—filling follows dredging. Cut-offs on alluvial streams or along alluvial rivers have not been demonstrated to be satisfactory methods of flood control.

DIVERSIONS AND FLOODWAYS

Flood control along the lower Mississippi River, as well as along the Sacramento and probably other streams, contemplates the diversion method. This involves the diversion of the excess waters; in alluvial streams the troughs of the basins are lower than the banks of the river.

The question of controlled and uncontrolled diversions becomes important. Generally, diversions may be classified as humanly controlled, automatically controlled, and uncontrolled.

The outstanding example of a controlled diversion is the Bonne Carre spillway. The Government owns the lands in the spillway. There are none to protest against the operation of the spillway, but where the diversions occur over lands that are grazed or cultivated the human element must be considered. Experience has demonstrated that the automatically controlled diversion, in such cases, is by far the most satisfactory. One humanly controlled diversion was constructed along the Sacramento River; two automatic diversions were built. There was always difficulty about the operation of the humanly controlled diversion; those who had property in the path of the floods that would be diverted protested; those who were injured because of the excess waters urged the operation of the floodway.

The humanly controlled diversion contemplates a movable dam or other structure which can be operated to control the flow of the water through or over it. The automatically controlled structure contemplates a permanent spillway or sill that will not be destroyed as a result of the diversion of excess floodwaters.

Uncontrolled diversions are generally synonymous with what are called fuse-plug levees. These levees are of lower elevation than the levee on the opposite side or the levees above or below. Their advantage is that the first cost is inexpensive; the disadvantage is that after being crevassed they are not available before the next flood comes.

The term "fuse-plug levee" is new. As a matter of fact, it has obtained, especially in the lower Mississippi Valley, for years. The levees that were lower than the levees on the other side of the stream were the first to crevasse. Those who criticize the fuse-plug levee in one area of the lower Mississippi River have advocated its inclusion in another area. Much damage could be done by not restoring a crevassed levee in time for the next flood season. Automatically controlled structures, therefore, are the most desirable in important diversions.

RESERVOIRS

Reservoirs provide an ideal method of flood control from a strictly engineering standpoint, but the costs are excessive. The costs of reservoirs on the headwaters of tributaries for flood control in the lower stretches of alluvial rivers are really prohibitive.

Reservoirs are effective for the control of floods especially along the smaller streams and the tributaries of the larger rivers. There are two types of flood reservoirs—storage and detention. In the storage reservoirs all water can be held and released through controlled outlets. Rapid emptying is necessary in storage reservoirs. In detention reservoirs the outlets are permanently opened to provide ordinarily for the normal flow of the stream. This method has been used for the flood-control dams along the Miami River in the Dayton, Ohio, area.

Reservoirs for flood control along the lower Mississippi River have been advocated especially by those who live along the tributaries. While an ideal method of control, the costs are excessive and long delays in construction would result.

Section 10 of the Flood Control Act of 1928 directed the Mississippi River Commission to investigate most thoroughly reservoirs along the tributaries. The purpose was to ascertain if reservoirs could be constructed so as to eliminate provisions for diversions or floodways.

A comprehensive report was submitted and was published as House Document 259, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session. One hundred and fifty-seven reservoirs were investigated; the total capacity was approximately 94,000,000 acre-feet; the estimated cost was $1,126,121,000. The Chief of Engineers, the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and the Mississippi River Commission reported that if these reservoirs along the Mississippi River were constructed and in operation, a diversion either through the Boeuf Basin or through the Macon Basin, could be eliminated, but they further reported, as all accomplished engineers agree, that the levee system that now obtains, with the reservoir system, would be imperative and must be maintained to protect the lower Mississippi Valley from maximum floods.

Those promoting reservoirs for local flood control along the tributaries of the Mississippi River make the mistake of asserting that the policy of levees has failed. In their eagerness for local protection they would destroy protection in the lower Mississippi Valley.

Gen. H. B. Ferguson, president of the Mississippi River Commission, in testifying before the Flood Control Committee of the House in May 1935, said that about 12 percent of the storage of the 157 reservoirs at about 14 percent of the estimated costs of the 157 reservoirs had been constructed at Fort Peck, on the Muskingum, the Tigret, and the Tennessee Rivers, but he stated that the combined effect would be to reduce the floods only 50,000 cubic second-feet at the mouth of the Arkansas River, where in a maximum flood there are a million cubic feet that must be diverted. The effect would be to reduce the floods at the mouth of the Arkansas River one-half a foot.

Again, Gen. Edgar Jadwin, Chief of Engineers, estimated that in the flood of 1913 if all of the water flowing by Pittsburgh on the Ohio River, all of the water flowing by St. Paul on the Mississippi River, and all of the water flowing by Sioux City on the Missouri River had been held back by reservoirs, the flood waters south of Cairo would have been reduced by only 2 percent.

The reservoirs on the Miami River in Ohio contribute to reducing the Cairo gage one-fifth of an inch.

Arthur E. Morgan, chairman of the Tennessee Valley Authority, made the following statement in connection with the great Mississippi flood of 1927:

"The excessive rains which cause any single flood seldom extend over more than 20 percent of the whole drainage area of the Mississippi River. * * * Flood control of the lower Mississippi by means of reservoirs on the headwaters of the streams is a delusion."

The Chief of Engineers has repeatedly testified in hearings on flood control that the control of the floods in the lower Mississippi Valley cannot be accomplished by reservoirs on the tributaries of the Mississippi River. The cost of construction is prohibitive and the time required would unduly and dangerously delay protection, but if constructed the diversions are necessary insurance while the reservoirs are being built.

Reservoirs constructed primarily for flood control cannot be used for the development of power or for reclamation. It takes an empty reservoir to provide for flood prevention, while it takes a full reservoir to generate power.

Again, reservoirs constructed for flood-control purposes to benefit the lower Mississippi River cannot benefit the local areas as fully and as completely as reservoirs constructed primarily with the view to protecting the local area along the headwaters of the tributaries. The most effective reservoirs for flood control along the lower Mississippi River are those that are located closest to the alluvial valley, as in the Yazoo Basin.

But there is a place for reservoirs; they are beneficial for flood control along the tributaries. There are areas that can be protected by the use of dams. This is especially true where the benefits will exceed the costs of construction.

The best way to promote reservoirs along the tributaries is to concede that they supplement but cannot substitute for levees or diversions along the lower Mississippi River.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER

The Mississippi River is the great drainage canal of the Nation. The alluvial valley extends from Cape Girardeau, Mo., to the head of the passes where the river flows into the Gulf of Mexico. The distance by river is 1,100 miles, but as the crow flies the distance is 600 miles. The valley ranges from a width of 20 miles in the vicinity of Natchez to a width of 80 miles in the vicinity of Greenville, the average width being 50 miles. Twenty million acres, before the building of levees, were subject to overflow. The major floods come on an average of once in 15 years. Ordinary or minor floods occur from 5 to 10 years. The area includes the St. Francis Basin, the Yazoo Basin, the Tensas Basin, composed of the Boeuf and Macon Valleys, the Atchafalaya Basin, and the LaFourche Basin, as well as the alluvial lands adjacent to the Mississippi River on the east bank around Lake Ponchartrain.

The territory drained by the Mississippi River and its tributaries consists of all or parts of 31 States, is equivalent to 41 percent of the area of the United States, and has a total area of 793,600,000 acres. The problem of flood control in the lower Mississippi Valley involves confining the waters between levees 4 miles apart from Cairo to the Gulf that formerly covered a channel 50 miles wide.

Bienville chose the site for New Orleans because it was about high water at the time he found it. The first levee built at New Orleans was in 1717. Ten years later it was the boast of the Governor that the levee was a mile long and 18 feet wide. The country was being settled; lands were being cleared. By 1812 the landowners had leveed the river on both banks for 340 miles above and below New Orleans.

By 1927, the entire levee line from Cape Girardeau to the Gulf had been substantially completed to the 1914 grade. The total amounts contributed by the Federal Government for building the levees, as compared with the local contributions, were small. All of the natural outlets were closed except the outlet through the Atchafalaya River.

The history of the improvement of the Mississippi River, the largest and longest, navigable river in the world, is interesting. The improvements were begun and continued until 1927, primarily in aid of navigation. Flood control came in at the back door. It is worthy of note in passing that more tonnage is carried along the Mississippi River today than in the halcyon steamboat days before the coming of railways.

Congress in 1820 appropriated $5,000 to investigate the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. S. Bernard and Joseph G. Tutten, Army engineers, made the surveys and submitted the report in 1822. It was in 1850, upon the election of Gen. Zachary Taylor as President, that Congress appropriated $50,000 for starting the surveys made by the Army engineers, Humphreys and Abbott. General Taylor had been a cotton planter in Louisiana; he had lived on the banks of the Mississippi River. The report of these engineers made in 1861 remains as the most authoritative report ever published on the Mississippi River, or on any other river.

During the War between the States improvements along the Mississippi River were interrupted. Following the war the States and local interests were unable to rebuild. The levees built by the local interests were destroyed during the war by the armies of the contending forces for military purposes. The great floods continued to appear.

From the first Federal aid for improvements along the Mississippi River was primarily for channel stabilization to promote navigation; however, leading statesmen advocated flood control—Henry Clay, John C. Calhoun, Thomas H. Benton, Abraham Lincoln, and James A. Garfield were among the American statesmen who advocated the improvement of the Mississippi River for commerce and for flood control.

The Mississippi River Commission was organized in 1879. In 1881 Congress appropriated $1,000,000 for improvements on the Mississippi River, primarily for navigation.

An appropriation of $4,000,000 in 1882 was vetoed by the President. Subsequent appropriations were increased, and by 1912, $6,000,000 was being appropriated annually.

The Flood Control Act of 1917 authorized the first definite appropriation for flood control. The Government contributed one-half the costs of building levees where the local interests had been unable to build them. The work was interrupted and impeded by the World War. A subsequent flood-control act was passed in 1923 with an authorization of $60,000,000. It was intended to supplement and reenforce the Flood Control Act of 1917 interrupted, as I have stated, by the World War.

The policy of levees only prevailed. The Cypress Creek outlet in the vicinity of Arkansas City, at the head of the Boeuf Basin, was the last natural outlet to be closed. A monumental mistake was made. This outlet was closed in 1921. The great flood of 1927 demonstrated that levees only would not solve the problem. Two hundred and forty-six people lost their lives; 700,000 people were driven from their homes; the lower Mississippi Valley was flooded from April until August; no crops in many areas were made; property was damaged and destroyed, according to the report of the Chief of Engineers, in value from $200,000,000 to $400,000,000. The American people voluntarily contributed, through the American Red Cross for rescue and relief work, $18,000,000.

Congress, in response to public sentiment, put its hand to the plow. The people of the lower valley had done their best; they had spent $292,000,000, according to the report of the Chief of Engineers, in an effort to protect their lives and their property. It was apparent to the country that they were unable to protect themselves from the waters that came from points as far east as Pittsburgh and as far west as Idaho and from the waters of all the territory between the Alleghenies and the Rockies.

The local interests had incurred large indebtedness in building the levees to the 1914 grade. There were millions of dollars in outstanding bonds; recurring floods had resulted in bankruptcy to some of the local levee boards. The Flood Control Act of 1928 was passed; $325,000,000 were authorized. The project provided for diversions, spillways, and floodways to supplement levees. The Flood Control Act in express terms declared, and I quote from the act:

"No local contribution to the project herein adopted is required."

Nevertheless, in spite of their large outstanding bonded indebtedness, the people of the Lower Mississippi Valley were required to furnish the rights-of-way and to maintain the works. Because of the improvement of the country the costs to the people of the Lower Mississippi Valley since the Flood Control Act of 1928 have been substantially what they were prior thereto.

The Flood Control Act provided for an uncontrolled or fuse-plug levee in the vicinity of Cypress Creek. The outlet in that region, as I have stated, had been closed in 1921. Highways had been constructed; lands had been cleared; cities had been established. It was the intent of the act to compensate those who had relied upon the protection of the Government when the outlet was closed in 1921. The property owners have never been compensated. The uncontrolled diversion has always been a source of dissatisfaction and irritation.

No responsible person believed that $325,000,000 would complete the project when the act of 1928 was passed. The Committee on Commerce of the Senate on March 24, 1928, in reporting the bill, made the following observation:

"This work is of such magnitude that the sum of $325,000,000 must be considered as simply an estimate. The actual cost of the work will doubtless be much more. If, as the work nears completion, an additional sum is found to be necessary, there can be no doubt but that Congress will authorize its appropriation.

Maj. Gen. Edward M. Markham, Chief of Engineers, at the hearings before the Commerce Committee of the Senate in January 1936, stated that the costs of protecting the alluvial valley, as recommended by the Mississippi River Commission in 1923, was approximately $775,000,000. He further stated that no one had any expectation that $325,000,000 would effect complete flood control in the lower Mississippi Valley. Moreover, in all of the appropriations made by Congress since the Mississippi River Commission was established in 1879, provision has been made for navigation. It has played a most important part; $100,000,000 of the $325,000,000 authorized in the act of 1928 were for the improvement of the Mississippi River for navigation.

YAZOO AND ST. FRANCIS RIVERS

The Yazoo River in Mississippi and the St. Francis River in Arkansas are located in the alluvial valley. The residents are being taxed for flood protection along the lower Mississippi River. There are 4,250,000 acres of land in the Yazoo Basin. There are two flood problems—one from the overflows of the Mississippi River and the other from the overflow of the Yazoo River system. The Yazoo River takes its source near the Tennessee State line and flows southerly along the foothills of the Yazoo Basin and empties into the Mississippi River at Vicksburg. While the Flood Control Act of 1928 declared that flood control in the lower Mississippi Valley was a national question and that the local interests should not be required to make contribution, the fact remains, as I have stated, that at the time of the adoption of the act the local interests were required to maintain the works after completion and to provide for rights-of-way.

There were millions of dollars in bonds outstanding. The people in the Yazoo Basin, including the Yazoo River system, are now and have been for 75 years contributing to flood-control works along the Mississippi River. In addition, they have expended, as shown by the report of the Chief of Engineers, $20,000,000 for local protection; they have taxed themselves to the limit; they have paid for protection which they have not received. The cases of these rivers are different from any other stream. No other streams, except those now protected in the alluvial valley, are paying for flood works along the lower Mississippi River. Flood-control projects, therefore, along the Yazoo and St. Francis Rivers are included in the pending Overton bill. I repeat that their cases are different from any other rivers that are tributary to the Mississippi River. No other similar taxpayers are now and have been contributing to flood-control works along the Mississippi River. The valleys of these two tributaries are the largest, most productive, and highly improved along the Mississippi River.

OVERTON BILL

On February 12, 1935, after further examination and after thorough study, the Chief of Engineers recommended an expansion and enlargement of the Flood Control Act to provide for the substitution of a controlled diversion, with compensation for flowage rights, at Eudora as a substitute for the Boeuf fuse-plug diversion. Provisions for compensation and for diversion in the Atchafalaya Basin were contained in the recommendation. Flood-control works along the St. Francis and Yazoo Rivers affected by the backwaters of the Mississippi River and located wholly within the alluvial valley were contained in the recommendation.

The Overton bill was considered by the Senate for 3 months. It contains an authorization of $272,000,000. It provides for compensation for flowage rights in the Eudora diversion and in the Atchafalaya Basin. It recognizes and emphasizes that the Flood Control Act of 1928 is sound; that all of the appropriations that have been made for flood protective works by Congress for the past 50 years were wise. The levees only system did not wholly fail; it was inadequate. They were not large enough. It has been supplemented by diversions. All of the money appropriated under the act of 1928 will be utilized; every foot of levee constructed will be continued. There is no change in the fundamental features of the adopted project. The recommendations of the Chief of Engineers are for the expansion and for the enlargement of the project. While it involves an authorization of $272,000,000, $72,000,000 is for channel stabilization and in aid of navigation. The Treasury of the United States is protected. Much has been said about the costs of lands and damages to utilities and railroads. The taxpayers of the Nation are protected. Their rights are safeguarded. The bill provides that the diversions will not be made until and unless flowage rights and property can be acquired at a valuation not to exceed $22,500,000. The amounts authorized will be spent for levees and other protective works. Revetments will be constructed in aid of navigation; stabilization and channelization to promote navigation will obtain.

The Senate has passed the bill. It is now pending in the House. It is sound; it is recommended by the Chief of Engineers; it has been 9 years since a major flood occurred in the lower Mississippi Valley. Delay is dangerous; we are approaching another flood.

There is universal sentiment that the Federal Government should bear the costs of an adequate flood-control system in the lower Mississippi Valley. Congress has so declared in the Flood Control Act of 1928. The pending bill is merely a supplemental authorization to carry out the provisions of the original act and to give effect to the intent of Congress.

Delay is dangerous. The Mississippi River has been studied more carefully than any other river in the world. The solution of the flood-control problem is known. Only the execution of the project remains.

Those who advocate flood-control works in other parts of the country can best promote their adoption by conceding that the problem of flood control in the lower Mississippi Valley should be treated as separate and distinct from any other flood-control problem in the country. The Chief of Engineers so recommends. He speaks for the country; he is impartial. Cooperation and not criticism or selfish opposition will promote flood control not only in the lower Mississippi Valley but throughout the country.

OMNIBUS BILL

In 1935 Congress passed and there is now pending in the Senate a flood-control bill for flood-control works along many of the principal rivers of the United States. The bill, as introduced in the House, contemplated only such projects as the Chief of Engineers approved; it was intended that only those projects where the benefits exceed the costs would be embraced in the measure. It was passed by the House at a time of widespread unemployment. There were adequate safeguards; the local interests were required to cooperate. The bill provides generally that the works will not be done until and unless the States or other responsible local interests furnish rights-of-way, agree to save the Government free from all damages, and maintain the works after their completion.

The best way to promote flood control is to insist that all unworthy projects be eliminated. A sound program must obtain.

The Senate committee is giving careful consideration to the bill, and earnest efforts are being made to pass an omnibus flood-control measure that will have the approval of the Chief of Engineers of the United States. The bill, as amended by the Senate, containing a policy has been ordered reported to the Senate.

PLANNING

During the past 3 years agencies have been established to study flood-control problems. Too many agencies, however, result in inefficiency. There is a further danger that we are likely to become top-heavy with commissions. The danger with planning is that too much of it is theory. Excellent work was done by the Mississippi Valley Committee of the Public Works Administration and by the National Resources Board; however, their recommendations respecting flood control have followed generally the recommendations of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army in the surveys to which I have referred. It is a tribute to the Chief of Engineers and to the Corps of Engineers that all boards and all plans have followed the leadership of the Corps of Engineers in the formulation of plans for flood control.

The careful surveys provided by Congress have been made. The leading rivers of the United States have been studied. It is now suggested that instead of passing an adequate flood-control measure, another commission be appointed and that further studies be made, and that additional plans be formulated, before the omnibus bill is passed.

Those who advocate such a cause stand primarily for reforestation and the prevention of soil erosion. Further plans for such purposes may be necessary, but I submit that such plans, so far as flood control is concerned, are not in order and mean nothing more or less than delay. The time for action has arrived. There will be no haste. Studies have been made; engineering plans that are sound have been prepared. Congress has the opportunity to adopt a sound program.

NATIONAL POLICY

I am sympathetic with flood control along all rivers and in all States. There must be no "pork barrel." Projects must be sound. I represent a district, and I represent in part a State where there are many rivers with perplexing flood-control problems. I do not ask that these rivers be given the same treatment as that accorded by the Federal Government to the lower Mississippi Valley. I ask that all rivers and all projects be treated on their merits. I believe that such a policy will promote national flood control.

Excessive floods are a menace to the national welfare. The social security of the people is threatened. Congress should adopt a policy that is national; Congress should declare that destructive floods constitute a national problem, that flood control in proper cases is a proper function of the Federal Government. Legislation should provide that the Federal Government will improve or participate in the improvement of streams for flood-control purposes if the benefits to whomsoever they accrue are in excess of the estimated costs and if the lives and social security of the people are otherwise materially and adversely affected.

Congress should further declare that there is a Federal interest in flood-control improvements, whether they are by levees or reservoirs, that may be impracticable of initiation or execution because of complications between the States, their political subdivisions, or local organizations.

It may be difficult to fix a definite Federal yardstick for contribution. The provision should be flexible; the benefits should control; the works should be distributed among all sections of the country. The requirement of local contribution will serve to eliminate projects that are unsound and the further requirement that the benefits must exceed or equal the costs will protect the Treasury of the United States.

It is imperative that the Flood Control Committee speedily consider and promptly report and that the House pass the Overton bill. It is equally imperative for the Senate to eliminate all inadequate and unworthy projects from the omnibus bill and to report and pass a bill that provides for adequate flood-control projects whenever and wherever needed.

The President insists that prior consideration be given to emergency flood-control measures. It is admitted by all that the problem of the lower Mississippi River is an emergency one. The best way to promote a national policy of flood control is for the friends of flood control to unite to secure the prompt passage of the Overton bill and the immediate passage of the omnibus flood-control bill.

I know of no public expenditures that gives to the people of the United States as large a return as the improvement of our waterways for flood control and navigation.

Many years ago river and harbor projects were regarded as notorious examples of congressional logrolling, but Congress has cleaned house; all river and harbor projects are now considered on a merit basis.

I advocate a policy of national flood control. The plan should embrace the Mississippi River; it should embrace its tributaries; it should provide for flood control whenever and wherever the Federal interests require it.

In all plans the taxpayers must be protected. What agency will better represent both the public and the Government in all plans for national flood control than the Corps of Engineers? They have studied and examined practically all of our rivers; millions of dollars have been spent in making examinations. The Corps of Engineers are familiar with the problems of all of our rivers; they are among the ablest engineers in the United States; they are impartial; there has been no taint or hint of fraud in the works under their control and supervision. There must be an executive who has the final say. The Chief of Engineers should be in charge of the program.

In the interest of efficiency and for the public good, I believe that the formulation and execution of policies for national flood control should be under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, with the power and authority in him to utilize, in connection with the Corps of Engineers, the best engineering talent among the civilian engineers of the country. There is a place in the picture for all capable engineers.

New times and new conditions demand new measures. I am interested in little waters, but I am emphasizing big waters. The digging of a few ditches, the building of a few dams will not suffice. The planting of grass and trees and soil-conserving crops is not enough. There is a place for the policy of soil conservation, but there is also a definite place in the program for flood control. There must be levees, diversions, and reservoirs. The two policies should supplement each other. There is no conflict but each has its own sphere. The increasing hazards to our advancing civilization demand protection from the floods that can be economically prevented.

The responsibility upon Congress can only be discharged by the prompt passage of measures that will provide for the initiation and execution of a sound policy of national flood control.

IZELDA BOISONEAU

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill—H. R. 7468—for the relief of Izelda Boisoneau, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$4,000."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin, my colleague Mr. GEHRMANN had some discussion with the gentleman from Maryland, in which there was to be an effort made to retain the original amount of the House bill.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. That is correct; but I find on examination this bill is not the kind of a bill we previously passed as to Federal employees, but grows out of an accident caused by a Federal employee to a citizen.

Mr. BOILEAU. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was concurred in, and a motion to reconsider the vote by which it was concurred in was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CROWE, for today, on account of important business.

To Mr. ECKERT, for 2 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. FIESINGER, for 12 days, on account of official business.

To Mr. FORD of California (at the request of Mr. COLDEN), for 3 days, on account of official business.

To Mr. KLOEB, for 10 days, on account of important business.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday of this week be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PRICE DISCRIMINATION—ADDRESS BY SENATOR LOGAN

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an able address delivered Sunday night last over the Mutual Broadcasting System of New York by my colleague the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] on the subject of the so-called Robinson price-discrimination bill.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, I want to help you to understand the Robinson-Patman bill. I regard it as one of the most important pieces of legislation that has come before Congress in many years. I want to tell you this evening, first, about the ideals upon which it is conceived; second, the competitive evils against which it is directed; third, the methods by which it would attack those evils; fourth, some misunderstandings that have been broadcast with regard to it by its opponents; and, finally, the importance of its enactment.

This bill is founded upon ideals of equal treatment, equal opportunity, and fair play. There is nothing new or startling in the idea that a merchant should treat all his customers alike. The one-price system, the principle of equal treatment of customers, has in fact become so deeply rooted in popular habits of thought and feeling, that every effort is usually made to keep any departure from it shrouded in secrecy. Thus, when the American Can Co. gave a special 18-percent discount on tin cans to the Van Camp Packing Co. it kept it secret even from its own salesmen and insisted to its other customers that it was making the same prices to all. When the Goodyear Tire Co. gave a similar price advantage on rubber tires to Sears-Roebuck, it did the same thing, bound Sears-Roebuck not to mention it orally or in writing, guarded the contract in its confidential files, and even denied to its own independent dealers that it was selling tires to Sears-Roebuck when they complained that they could not possibly compete against such an arbitrary price advantage.

Equal treatment, however, does not mean equal prices, and the Robinson-Patman bill does not require equal prices. The ideal of equal opportunity expresses the right of every man to devote his ability and efforts to the satisfaction of human wants and to be rewarded according to their value, skill, and efficiency; the ideal of fair play, on the other hand, expresses his willingness to accord the same right to every other man. None but the narrowly selfish and grasping would ask for a system of equality that would give every customer the same price regardless of the differing costs of serving them. The Robinson-Patman bill prohibits price discriminations only to the extent that they exceed those differences. To that extent they have nothing to do with efficiency. To that extent they become instruments of oppression in the hands of the powerful, with which the advantages of real efficiency may, in fact, be destroyed in their competitors.

The evils at which the Robinson-Patman bill is aimed are the outgrowth of two particular developments in trade and industry during the last 20 years. These are the increase in machine production and the rise of the mass distributor with his large and concentrated buying power. Machine production has increased the burden of overhead cost in industry—costs which regularly fall due and must be met, regardless of the volume of production; undiminished when it falls and unaugmented when it rises.

Anxiety to meet those costs is the manufacturer's weakness upon which the mass distributor preys. For a manufacturer can afford to sell part of his goods at a price below their net cost and still make something on them against this burden of overhead, which he would lose entirely if that business were withdrawn. And any competing manufacturer who is running below capacity will be glad to take that business away from him at that same low price below cost, since it will yield him something additional against his burden of overhead. Mass buyers are thus able to play off the financial necessities of one manufacturer against another, and out of their competing distress coin price advantages which their smaller competitors cannot possibly meet.

This has nothing to do with any question of efficiency. The advantages to which I refer are those granted without any reference to comparative efficiency—advantages, indeed, which may run directly opposite to comparative efficiency. Chains and mass distributors are not more efficient just because they are larger. Independent merchants are also efficient. They must be so, or so many of them could not have survived against the chains, armed, as they are, with these oppressive advantages. The independent renders many distinctive services which the chains have never attempted to duplicate, and the consumer is entitled to the benefit of those services without having them loaded with a burden of cost from which the favored mass distributor has managed to escape. For every manufacturer depends upon his sales to all his customers to cover his necessary cost and yield him his reasonable profit. To do this he may either charge each customer a price representing his proportionate share of that cost and profit, or he may charge some less and others more. If he does charge less to some, he must charge more to others or he will land in the red. Thus it is that price favors to a few cast an inevitable burden upon all the rest and upon the consuming public whom they serve.

Such discriminations naturally favor the larger buyer and the larger seller, as against their respective competitors. The larger the buyer the more serious it is to the seller to lose his business and the further he will cut his prices to keep it. The larger the seller and the more numerous his list of smaller customers the easier it is to make up from them the losses he sustains in price cuts to the favored mass buyer. Price discriminations thus become ever more and more effective in the hands of the larger and larger buyer and seller, against their smaller competitors. As such, it is a natural menace to competition; an instrument for the promotion of monopoly. To deny this merely because an actual monopoly has not yet been achieved is like denying that a leak in the dike may grow to a flood just because the flood has not yet reached your doorstep.

Now, as to methods. The Robinson-Patman bill is directed at the three particular forms in which discriminatory abuses are prevalently found. The first is excessive-quantity discounts. Quantity discounts that reflect real savings or economies made possible by the greater quantities purchased are economically sound and beneficial to the consumer. With them the bill does not interfere. It expressly exempts from its prohibitions price differentials reflecting differences in cost, whether in manufacture, sale, or delivery, whether direct or indirect, whether operating cost or overhead, so long as they result from the differing methods or quantities in which sales and deliveries are made to the customers concerned. But it prohibits price discriminations in excess of those differences, for there it is that the mass buyer evades his proportionate burden of costs and casts it upon his smaller competitors. Sometimes, however, a manufacturer offers a special discount only on such a large quantity order that only one or two large buyers in the whole field are able to take it. This, too, may become a weapon of oppression and monopoly, and the bill accordingly authorizes the Federal Trade Commission where necessary to fix quantity limits beyond which further special discounts shall not be permitted. But it can only fix quantity limits; it cannot fix the discounts themselves. And it can only fix those limits as to an entire commodity line or industry. It cannot fix them selectively as to particular buyers or sellers.

The second favorite form of discrimination lies in the exaction of brokerage commissions where true brokerage services have not been rendered. A true broker is an agent of trust engaged by the seller to find a buyer or by the buyer to find a seller and paid by the one whom he serves. Large buyers, however, frequently set up an employee or a subsidiary corporation in the guise of a broker, refuse to buy except through him, and pocket the commissions which the manufacturer is thus forced to pay him for serving another. The Robinson-Patman bill eliminates this betrayal of faith from the streams of commerce by prohibiting the payment of brokerage direct to the buyer or to anyone acting in fact in his behalf or under his control. It does not require the employment of brokers. It only forbids the payment of brokerage for a prostitution of that function.

The third favorite method of discriminatory abuse lies in the grant of special allowances for so-called advertising or promotional sales services to be rendered by the buyer in the resale of goods which he has purchased from the manufacturer. The buyer, of course, makes his own profit on the resale of those goods. He buys them only for that purpose; and if he doesn't sell them, they become a dead loss on his hands. Yet mass buyers have spun the fairy story that this is a special service to the manufacturer, and that he must pay them extra for doing only what they must do in any case for their own advantage and profit. It is merely a thinly disguised vehicle for another form of price discrimination. The Robinson-Patman bill forbids the payment of such allowances unless they are made available to all competing customers on the same terms.

The Robinson bill in the Senate then contains an additional provision which I am sorry to see omitted in the Patman bill as it has been reported to the House. This fixes the measure of damages for persons injured by violations of the act. It is designed to enable those suffering such injury more easily to seek their own redress in the courts. As such it will serve as an added deterrent against violation, and will relieve the Government, and consequently the taxpayers, of a corresponding burden and cost of enforcement. Its principle is justice. Its virtue is simplicity. I hope to see it incorporated in the bill as finally enacted.

Now, this bill has been subjected to much misunderstanding, some of which, I am sorry to say, has been studiously fomented by selfish interests opposed to its enactment. It is aimed at abuses which are profitable to those who practice them, abuses which are hard to defend on their merits; so it is perhaps natural that they have sought to draw a veil of misunderstanding across the public vision.

This is not a price-fixing bill. It has nothing to do with price fixing. It regulates only the relations between a seller and his several customers. It has nothing to do with the relations between one seller and another. It does not limit competition, except that vicious competition which sells below cost in order to destroy competition. It has nothing to do with methods of production or distribution. It lays no shackles upon them. It leaves everyone free to use the shortest and most efficient processes he can find or devise for the manufacture, sale, or distribution of goods; and it leaves him free to translate any savings so effected in the service of particular customers into price differentials favoring them accordingly. It only says, thus far may you go and no farther. You may outdistance your competitor, you may extinguish him, if you can, by superior efficiency, but you may not do so by force of your greater size and the mere power which that size affords.

There is nothing in the bill that can increase prices to the consumer, since it does not affect production costs. On the contrary, it will lower prices to that vast body of consumers who purchase from the independent merchant and from cooperatives and smaller chains, for it will relieve them of that added burden of cost which the mass buyer is now able to evade and to shoulder off upon them.

The bill is not designed in the special interest of any one class, unless you wish to call those oppressed by discriminatory abuses a particular class. It applies to all industries. On the contrary, attempts have been made by its opponents to have it limited to particular commodities, or to exclude particular commodities from it, in the hope, no doubt, that it might thereby be rendered unconstitutional.

It is not an anti-chain-store bill. It is intended as much for the protection of the smaller chain against the larger chain, and of the cooperative and voluntary chain against the larger corporate chain, as for the protection of the independent against mass distributors as a whole.

Finally, a word as to its importance. In the protection it offers to independent enterprise, it is important not alone to the millions of smaller merchants and manufacturers engaged in that field and to the greater millions of the consuming public whom they serve; it is of still greater importance to the thousands of smaller communities throughout the land who depend upon independent enterprise as embodied in their local merchants and manufacturers, for the principal support of their social, educational, and spiritual institutions, and for the employment of their youth. It stands for a richer and a more abundant life for those masses of our people who are the backbone and pride of our civilization.

Ladies and gentlemen, I have tried to explain to you the Robinson-Patman bill. If you want it enacted into law, I know your Senators and Representatives in Congress will be glad to hear from you to that effect.

POSITION OF AMERICA IN INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS—ADDRESS BY SENATOR LEWIS

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an able and interesting radio address delivered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] on April 20, 1936, dealing with America's position with relation to the nations of Europe and Asia at this time.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Citizens of the United States, for centuries up to 1920 the world nations turned upon each other to rend and destroy. This course of demolishing civilization and devastating mankind was the obedience to the edicts of secret treaties pledging destruction to any who became opponents to unknown decrees.

To abolish this execrable injustice, our America, in the name of liberty and democracy, sacrificed her treasure in billions of money and sent her sons to death in distant fields, buried in hidden hills—all smitten by the vengeance of revenging war. This World War commanded the toll of four hundred billions of dollars in value of money and property. Twelve million lives sacrificed. Five millions more crippled, blinded, shrunken, and withered to uselessness, destined to creep and hobble through the world to the hour of the final dispatch called death.

Then it was that civilization and Christianity molded a new world compact. This was to endow the order of family of nations, founded on faith of obligation and the declared love of mankind. A generation is now newborn. The captains of the modern formation revive and reinstate treaties for death of nations and covenants with the hell of war.

NEW DESTRUCTION BEING BORN

The old order resurrected is again to establish the secret vows of some part of mankind to desolate men and demolish the structure of worlds. This as penalty to such as do not yield obedience to the despot or tyrant. To achieve this purpose, armies and navies are anew constructed to quantity and quality unparalleled in all experience. To these are added engines and systems of heretofore unknown process of new annihilation.

Behold the panorama of nations arrayed for action:

England tortures Italy to combat; Italy cements France to alliance—this to assail the English contestant; France knits new bonds with Russia, to the purpose of frustrating Germany. Germany prepares to shatter France with aid of Austria and Italy. In this melee of wrestling horrors there arises in the shadows Japan, the new sovereign of Asia. This Japan confronts Russia, commanding from the Siberian slopes. China pits herself against invaders and prepares to slaughter wherever promiscuous and mysterious destruction can give deliverance.

"PEACE UNDER SWORDS"

Truly, with the oriental philosopher, we must exclaim:

"Peace is only under a canopy of swords!" while "life now survives under the swirling ships of the air raining down argosies of consuming flame."

To each of the death-dealing area confronts the organization of leagues of nations, combination of masters, compacts of sanctions, and control by committee of conquerors. These devices through their directors summon to the array the joint operation and solicit participation of our United States of America.

And here we propound the query: On what basis of justice can these historic nations command the partnership or adherence of the United States? We have it from the ancient law: "By the fruits of a tree, ye shall know it." These great nations now summoning us to bear responsibilities with them received from us what approximates twenty billions of American money.

Now, for months upon months these countries refuse to affirm the debt, decline to pay the interests, and openly assert to the world that they have stricken the obligation from what is called their budgets. This open announcement of repudiation of this debt has awakened the revolt impelled by the sense of honor from their own statesmen and eminent voices of authority.

DEBT HONOR TARNISHED

In England, the leaders of the Labor Party in Parliament express astonishment that the United States could be treated so unjustly. The great editors of the great papers of the party in power in England declare their abhorrence to the policy of "cheat and flee" pursued against us. In Canada, one of the great divisions of the British Government, the members of the board of aldermen, resenting the intimation of England that Montreal had not paid her debts as due to England upon some bond issue, hurled in retaliation that "England should have little to say as to repudiation of debts in view of the treatment she had subjected the United States to in the matter of the debts due that country."

In France, Herriot in the very late hours puts the query to France: "Where shall you go if again you should have the need to borrow and what shall we say as the reason for treating the United States as we have, when the world knows that but for that friendship a greater peril would have come upon us than can now be described?"

LINKS UNITED STATES IN EFFORTS

Again on this day the reports come that the premier, Baldwin, in his speech to his country constituents last week proclaimed the necessity for the United States to join as a necessary condition to obtain mass security for peace. France, asking that the Locarno Treaty be preserved to the point of granting security to France, makes known to the world the need of the United States joining England to the point of reviving the Locarno Treaty, now forsaken by Germany and repudiated by all nations with the exception of the two asking its revival.

Let us ask where is anything that can be adopted as an inducement to America to make any other move of favor or benefit toward these debtors whose treatment has humiliated America before the world and discredited their own honor before mankind? Since such has been their treatment in the past, what can be looked forward to for the future?

This Nation, in obedience to the policy of home preservation, has kept aloof. She rides her seas and treads her low paths alone. She gives salutation of friendship to all nations and offers prayer for peace to all people.

NO PROFIT IN CHOICE

We summon the witnessing mankind to the vindication by events of the American nationalist policy. Reflect upon the situation:

We are at peace with all the world. Were this United States to have joined with England in sanctions, there would be for us at this time the enmity of Italy, the suspicion and accusation of France, and the chill or hot temper from Germany. Did we ally with France, we would have the enmity of the German people and the hostility of England. And were we to espouse with Germany, we invite the antagonisms of Russia—while to conjoin with Russia is to arouse either Japan or Germany, or perchance both, in union against us.

To this add the thought of how our taking sides would bring disputes and conflicts in our home places among those who are the descendants of those lands in war, were we to espouse one or more against opponents in the others. We would be beseiged at our doors with enemies, where had been patriots devoted to our flag.

This United States, with the churning seas mounting between us as though constructed by Heaven as our barrier and protection, our obligation of non-interference with the affairs of European nations, standing fortified by an adequate Navy, constructed only for the fullness of defense, and an Army continued in volume to the sufficiency only of a national police to oppose invaders, affords the triangle of barricades as our sure safety.

By these tokens we summon civilization to witness how the gods of creation destined our situation as the sure divine preservation of the American.

SHALL WE ESPOUSE DELUSION?

By this exhibit we command you to answer: Shall we forsake our promontory of guardianship reaching to the stars at eventide and gilded by the daily sun of celestial splendor? Shall we leave this Elysium of happy isolation to risk the fate of shattered existence under the assaults of the offended nations revenging our partiality to rivals and foes? Shall we indulge the fatuous allurement of prated peace and mock friendships of secret enemy, to obey the deluded persuasion that with the United States entwined in the maze of world murders, all would surrender to our signal and under our entrance a new impulse of love would flow universal?

Let no such deceiving credulity possess our now separate and sovereign national Commonwealth. Let none of our countrymen be so bold in their seduced confidences as to persuade this people to depart its faith and desert its path. Fixed in the devotion to peace with all nations, abiding in the friendship of the world on the basis of honor sanctified in religion, this United States stands at a distance alone on the heights of acknowledged eminence. We hold the hands of our children to guide them through the vale of distractions, as we pray the blessings of heaven. Yet with all we proclaim to the world, "This is America"—and—

"True to our colors, tho' our shadows grow dark
We'll direct our sails as before—
And hold hard the rudder that governs our bark
Nor ask how we look from the shore."

I thank you. I bid you good night.

THE HOUSING PROGRAM—ADDRESS BY SENATOR WAGNER

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD an address delivered on April 27, 1936, by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] on the subject of The Housing Program. The address is quite informative and very interesting.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Friends of the radio audience, any discussion of public issues at the present time should commence with the recognition that business recovery has been largely achieved. It is impossible for me in the short space of a single talk to cite all the evidences of this recovery. Let me call your attention, however, to an outstanding fact. It is generally conceded that the automobile trade is one of the best indexes of industrial conditions. According to an estimate by Dun & Bradstreet, issued last week, the number of automobiles produced during the month of April will be about 100,000 greater than during the month of March. These impressive figures, if taken alone, might be explained by special causes. But we know that they exemplify what is going on in steel, in retail trade, in railroading, and in our other key industries.

These gains have been promoted through the instrumentality of the New Deal policy. So effective an instrument cannot be laid aside when one task is accomplished. It must rather be devoted to the new problems of society and the new responsibility of government. While the depression has been broken, there is still need to create even wider opportunities for reasonable business profits. There is still need to give the average man an even better chance to earn a decent living in the present and to look with fearless security toward his future. Above all, there is still need to make sure that large and deserving sections of our population are not forgotten in the midst of recovery. The yet un-cured sore spots in our economic system must not be neglected or they will again threaten the whole system with disease.

While we have made tremendous progress toward national health, there are some of these sore spots which require additional treatment. Most important of all is the fact that millions of our people are unemployed. This is a strain upon the Government, because it means heavy relief rolls. It is a severe tax upon business because, in the final analysis, the Government is supported by business enterprise. It is a terrible social injustice to millions of men and women who see opportunity denied to them in a land founded upon the principle of equal opportunities for all.

Any sincere search for a cure for unemployment must commence with a careful diagnosis of its cause. This cause is not merely a hang-over from the depression, which will wear off in a few years of its own account. It is more serious than that. It is the result of changes in the mechanical methods of business, which have replaced men by machinery in hundreds of industries. During the first three decades of the present century these inventions were so far reaching that by 1930 one man was able to turn out as much work as two men could in 1900. Since the beginning of the depression this tendency has continued, so that today four men in a factory can accomplish as much as five men in 1929.

It has always been our American philosophy that these so-called technological improvements have been good for the people as a whole. We have felt ourselves progressing further and further away from the olden times, when human drudgery was the only form of labor, and when standards of living were very low. We are now approaching the possibilities of a new era of abundance, when standards of living will be uniformly higher and when working people will have greater opportunities for leisure and self-development. But if we are to capitalize upon these possibilities, work must be found somewhere for the millions who are being displaced by new inventions. Otherwise a costly army of unemployed, draining our national resources, will more than outweigh the benefits flowing from the new machinery. The great challenge still confronting our country, and, in fact, all civilization, is the challenge of the jobless.

All business interests are in unanimous agreement upon one phase of this problem. They are all agreed that the best way, the only permanent way, to remedy unemployment is to create useful jobs in private industry. They are also convinced that the occupation which offers the widest field for expansion at the present time is home building. While so many of our industries have climbed back to normal, the construction of dwellings is still in a very decided slump. Only 1 family was provided with new quarters in 1935 for every 10 families so provided for in 1925. During the first 4 months of the present year, home building has been proceeding at only one-fourth the normal rate. It is clear that about one-half of the total unemployment today is due directly to the lag in the construction industry.

The housing bill which I have introduced is therefore addressed toward the major economic problem of today. It is designed to assist in bringing the construction trades back to normal. It does not attempt to do this by substituting government for private initiative; for that would be a hopeless and an un-American task. But the measure is based upon the firm conviction that just as the Government helped so much to protect 2,500,000 home owners from foreclosure and eviction, just as the Government played its part in clearing up a mortgage situation that was ruining both lenders and borrowers, so the Government can and must face the affirmative task of getting the construction industry going at a faster pace.

The bill is based upon another equally important sense of responsibility. We all recognize that during the crisis of the recent emergency it was necessary to put people to work as rapidly as possible. Under such circumstances it was humanly impossible in all cases to select the most useful and permanent type of undertaking. It is remarkable how much good was done under the circumstances. But now the time has come when we should tie up reemployment even more closely with the development of long-term projects of a self-supporting character, selected solely upon the basis of their usefulness to the Nation.

There is nothing that could be so useful to the Nation as better housing. At least 11,000,000 families, meaning approximately 45,000,000 people, are now living under conditions that do not protect their health and safety. These bad housing conditions are not confined to the city nor to the country. The traveler who sets out upon a tour of the United States will find slums and shacks, inhabited by the underprivileged, in every State and county from New York to the Golden Gate.

If the traveler puts aside the superficiality of a quick visit, and delays long enough to enter these lowly homes and study the lives of their people, he will gather a very tragic history. He will learn that the danger of contracting tuberculosis is 30 times as high within the slums as elsewhere. He will find that in the lowest class of tenement rooms the infancy death rate is three times as high as normal. He will discover rundown sections of our country where the rate of juvenile delinquency is 300 times as high as in more prosperous areas. He will see that generation after generation of American children are forced to live in environments polluted by crime, by disease, and by the demoralizing knowledge that they are denied the chances which other people have.

Of course, thousands of people survive these conditions and are none the worse for them. Once every hundred years there may even be an Abraham Lincoln. But the exceptional case should not blind us to the ordinary cases—to the millions of cases where parents, even if they retain their health, see their children denied the right to live and learn and play in clean and healthful surroundings. The multiplication of hospitals, reformatories, and houses of correction, the fact that our homicide rate is over 30 times as high as in England, where the slums are being cleared, the very fact that the underworld is becoming the hunting ground of the young should be sufficient indication of what must be done. The probability that most people would not get smallpox in any event does not destroy the value of compulsory vaccination. We must now vaccinate all our people against the peril of the slums. The only way to do this is to destroy the slums. It must be emphasized frankly and at once that the slum problem is not a problem of low individual standards of morals or of taste. It cannot be solved by education, nor by propaganda, nor by preachments about better living. It is primarily a problem caused by millions of decent and respectable people who have not sufficient incomes to live decently. At the present time 18,000,000 families in America have earnings of less than $1,000 a year. Contrasted with this, the lowest income upon which a normal family of five can house itself in safety and sanitation is about $1,500 a year. This cold, cruel state of affairs has led all except the blind to acknowledge that some public assistance is necessary, if the poor are to be provided with decent housing, and if the well to do are to be protected from the contaminating influence of infected areas.

The bill, therefore, authorizes the Federal Government to make loans to State and municipal housing authorities, and to limited-dividend companies, to finance new dwellings for persons of low income. It also provides for supplementary grants, but only in an amount necessary to build homes for families of low income, and in no case to exceed 45 percent of the cost of any housing project. This grant may be made in a lump sum, or it may be spread equally over a period of years on an annuity basis.

Financial assistance of this type represents an eminently wise investment of public funds. Today both the National and State Governments are forced to pay huge rent subsidies in the form of pure relief to the needy. In New York City alone rent relief is now going on at the rate of $25,000,000 a year. The pending proposal will substitute business revival for relief. It will tie up every dollar of expenditure with genuine construction activity.

It will be cheaper for the Government, better for industry, and infinitely more just to the people who want decent homes.

Intended as it is to stimulate business and provide reemployment, the measure will not offer a single iota of competition to legitimate private industry. Every housing project that receives a penny of Federal assistance, either loan or grant, will be available only to those families of low income who cannot purchase safe or sanitary quarters elsewhere. No opportunities will be revoked, except the license to extract profit from dealing in the degredation of the meanest slums.

The huge possibilities of stimulus to private industry cannot be measured by the limited extent of the public undertakings under the bill. In England Government assistance to only about 15 percent of housing has ignited a huge building boom, which has been the main factor in the economic recovery of the country. Over here, as well, the construction of 125,000 family quarters a year with partial Federal assistance, and that predominately in the form of sound interest-bearing loans, should provide the groundwork of the development of 875,000 units each year by private industry alone. When we consider also the vast field of housing for the well to do, every $1 of Federal grant for low-rent housing during the next 4 years should mean $48 of private investment for home building of every type.

The most significant aspect of the bill, however, is not merely that it will stimulate building, but rather that it will stimulate the right kind of building. The foundation of a healthy home-construction industry is adequate provision for those at the bottom of the economic structure who need better homes most. We must not repeat the errors of the 1920's, when the building boom took care of those at the top but neglected the foundation, and thus ended in collapse. Our objective today is to transform the construction industry from a wavering luxury trade into a permanent stabilizing force.

Housing is a community matter. All the direction, planning, and management in connection with publicly assisted housing projects are to be vested in local authorities, springing from the initiative of the people themselves. The Federal Government will merely extend its financial aid through the medium of these agencies. The only exception to this rule is that for a limited time the Federal Government may set up a few demonstration projects in order that local communities without adequate instrumentalities of their own may benefit by an experience in low-rent housing. It is provided, however, that these demonstration projects shall be transferred to local agencies as soon as possible.

During the past week the Senate Committee on Education and Labor has held hearings upon this United States housing bill. While there were a few witnesses who differed with some of its specific provisions, all were in agreement upon its major objectives. Furthermore, the vast majority were in accord that the bill presented the best method now attainable for reaching these objectives. It was a remarkable experience to hear leaders in business, in social work, and in public life from every section of the country who came to Washington with an account of the deplorable effects that slums are producing upon the lives and hopes and aspirations of our people. But these spokesmen came also with the sure confidence that the Government now stands ready to do what it can to remedy such conditions. I am sure that this confidence on their part will be justified by the Congress at this session.

There is not a single interest which would be affected adversely by this measure, except those few who thrive by vending unsafe and unsanitary homes to the men, women, and children of America. By providing widespread employment in the industries that are most depressed, the bill will round out the cycle of recovery in banking, in commerce, and in industry. It will evoke the maximum outflow of private capital with a minimum investment of public funds. And it will combine these economic objectives with the humanitarian policy of clearing away the areas where disease and crime find their natural breeding place, and establishing a cleaner and healthier atmosphere in which the mothers of America may watch over their families, and in which the children of America may grow to a happier maturity.

TENNESSEE—ADDRESS BY SENATOR BACHMAN

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address on Tennessee, delivered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN] on Tennessee Day at the Washington Memorial Chapel, Valley Forge, Pa., April 26, 1936, under the auspices of the Colonial Dames of America.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Perhaps no State in the Union was so quickly evolved from a wilderness into an abode of cultured activity. It bears the sixteenth star, being third in order of admission into the Union, and the last State to be admitted under the administration of President George Washington.

The earliest attempt at settlement was made by North Carolina in 1754. Prior to that time there was a store and place of trade by the French on the Mississippi River where Memphis now stands, but this was transitory. This effort by North Carolina failed, as the settlers were driven away by the Indians.

In 1757 Fort Loudon was built on the Little Tennessee about 30 miles from the present site of Knoxville. The tragic story of this fort has been well described by Charles Egbert Craddock—one of the most pathetic narratives of American history.

In 1761 a larger force of enterprising settlers entered from Virginia and North Carolina, subdued the Indians, made a treaty with them, and established the "Watauga Association", near where Elizabethton now stands. North Carolina claimed all the region as its own and called it the "District of Washington", and for 7 years it was part of North Carolina.

In 1785 the people became dissatisfied with their government by North Carolina and formed an independent State under the name of "the State of Franklin" and maintained that organization till 1788, when they again acknowledged the control of North Carolina. In 1789 North Carolina ceded the region to the General Government, which in 1790 organized "the Territory of the United States south of the Ohio."

In 1796 part of this Territory was admitted into the Union as a State and the cumbersome title changed to the more euphonious one of Tennessee, upon the suggestion of Andrew Jackson, taken from the Cherokee name of its chief river "the Tenassee", the river of the big bend. The constitution of the new State was greatly praised by Thomas Jefferson as one of the best and most democratic. Through all the vicissitudes of the founding of their State the Tennesseeans maintained their freedom of thought and their own ideas of self-rule. They were from the beginning a cultured people and set their churches and schools in the center of every settlement, the University of Tennessee—old Blount College—was chartered in 1794, 2 years before the State was admitted, and Washington, Tusculum, and Maryville were log colleges in a wilderness.

In addition to the settlers from Virginia and North Carolina a small element came from Maryland, a fact which has been generally overlooked—these settlers were particularly well educated, some bearing degrees from the University of Glasgow and Trinity College, Dublin, and sufficiently grounded in the classics to be able to correspond in Latin during the Revolutionary War, as well as to expound "The Word" from the original Hebrew and Greek.

In the early twenties these humble log colleges had changed into brick, and academies, seminaries, and churches arose in every village, with white columns and gilded domes gleaming in the sunlight.

The first inhabitants, hunters and trappers, came on foot, cutting their way through the forest with the short ax, being armed with long guns, and later the Deckhart, used at Kings Mountain. After a trail was cut through, came the horse and pack saddle, for no wagon crossed the Allegheny Mountains into Tennessee before 1776.

After wagon roads were made trade became possible, and long lines of wagons came from Lynchburg, Va., which was the great entrepôt; and dry goods and delicacies were brought from Philadelphia and Baltimore. Many a bride's costume was brought out with "store tea", real coffee, and other luxuries.

The first houses were, of course, of logs. As soon as a clearing was made the cabin was raised, and in that day a man was famous as he lifted up his hand against a tree, not as he planted one. Everything had to be for utility; there was little time for sentiment, oak, elm, and tulip trees fell alike, and the ruthless slaughter of the walnut trees brings a pang to the heart of the true tree lover; many an old rail fence around a cabin being made of that beautiful wood; and in some cases the crossties of the first railroad in the State were cut from hardy walnut trees. This clearing was a prime necessity for cultivation but also as a protection against the Indians who would creep as closely as possible to any habitation, hiding behind a tree and imitating so accurately the scream of a wildcat or gobble of a wild turkey that many a luckless settler, hearing these sounds, went out with his gun, never to return.

Stone houses were built very early, both in eastern Tennessee and the middle part of the State, wherever an outcropping of limestone was found, and a crude cement was made from the sand by the creek or river bank.

The houses were usually comfortable but very cold in winter, as there was no mode of heating save by cavernous fireplaces, and to provide fuel magnificent hickory, ash, and cherry trees were destroyed.

The first brick house in Sullivan County was built from bricks burned on the place in 1799, the office in the yard and some of the cabins for the Negroes being made of the same material.

The first thought, of course, was for protection against wild beasts—the bear, panther, and wildcat—and the prowling Indians. The shutters were made of solid wood, and the iron hinges of the doors, hand forged, of the strap variety, were more than 2 feet long, heavily bracing the door at top and bottom, and the keys to the locks of these old cabins were large and heavy enough for weapons.

In the beginning everything was made on the place, and the location of a cabin near a spring was imperative and a running stream for the location of a mill to grind the corn into meal a necessity, as the settlers largely subsisted upon it for bread—and for a journey came the johnnycake, or journey cake. Parched meal was also used; the patriots who went over the mountains to Kings Mountain carried it as their rations, stooping, like Gideon's band, to lap up the water from the mountain brooks, for they stayed not on their march until they reached their objective and smote the Tories hip and thigh.

An important matter was the making of the candles, a necessary but laborious and tiresome job, but they were the only form of illumination except pine knots. Before the invention of matches it was a catastrophe for the fire to go out, and unless a spark could be struck from a flint and tinder a live coal must be brought a long distance from a neighbor's house.

The ash hopper, of V-shaped appearance, was a component part of every back yard, the ashes used for lye in making the soft soap, and in more than one case a small child has been hidden there during an Indian foray until his parents could claim him again, they fleeing more rapidly than his short legs could carry him, but taking time to place him carefully in and cover with dry leaves, and so carefully trained were the children by the "hushing" habit that even the smallest ones made no outcry when the Indians were about.

The spinning wheel and loom for weaving were also both necessities, for not only every garment but the cloth from which they were fashioned had to be made by the housewife and her helpers.

The linsey-woolsey, from which many a suit and dress was fashioned, was made in the house, as were also the great heavy woven coverlets (coverlids) of marvelous designs and beautiful colors, and the finely ribbed white counterpanes.

There were also woven on the plantations, summer blankets, a delightful covering, thin as cambric, and as warm as the sheep's wool from which it was made, with beautiful Roman striped borders, colored blue with indigo and a lovely rose, with madder.

The flax fields were important as the table linen and bed linen and towels were made from the fiber, the snow drop, a memory of old England, and Scotland, being a favorite pattern for the table linen.

There were no fresh fruits in the winter, so much labor was bestowed upon drying apples and peaches upon long racks in the hot sun, and carefully rolled peach leather was a great delicacy. Apple butter was made in large iron kettles over an open fire in the yard and stirred with a wooden perforated board, made oval shape, and attached to a handle 4 feet long. Honey was always plentiful, and a drink called metheglin was made from it. Game was abundant and the food soon became lavish and no stranger passed a gateway. In one old home of which I know, 30 people often sat at dinner, and guests who came for a day stayed for several; in some cases the visit lengthened into weeks.

The earliest dress for the men was the hunting garb, made Indianwise, with the fringed jacket and belt and worn with moccasins, or high leather boots, when they could be procured. A factory for hats was early established in Sullivan County and a good serviceable wool hat made there. The long woolen hose were knitted at home.

A few knee buckles existed, brought out with other small articles, but such fripperies were soon laid aside as unsuitable for the work to be done.

In the early pioneer days the dresses of the women were of the plainest, only the kind useful for the helpmeet of the pioneer subduing the wilderness, though many a bit of finery brought out in saddlebags from old Virginia was tucked away to be used at a bridal or christening, and many an old beaker or silver cup was brought forth upon a similar occasion.

Carefully cherished was the thread lace used to adorn the caps which the women began to wear when they were 40 years of age.

The furniture was simple, in most cases made on the plantation with the exception of a few ancestral pieces brought out in ox carts and wagons later. Beautiful bureaus, tables, beds, and chairs, still the pride of descendants, were made from the cherry and walnut trees which were so plentiful, also from the sweet gum, called liquid amber or the patriot's wood, as they refused to bring in any mahogany from the British colonies.

This furniture was usually plain, but of beautiful lines, with legs turned and backs hand carved, ample and strong. Often amid this simple furniture in a log cabin stood, incongruously, a fine old Chippendale clock tracing its ancestry back to old England, like the portrait of an ancestor, bespeaking a time and day of better things. The winding of these old clocks on Saturday night was a task which no one but the master of the house was allowed to perform, and with the passage of time it became almost a rite denoting eternity.

A quarter of a century after it became a State, Tennessee had greatly increased in wealth and goods, and was taking her rightful place among the sisterhood and was especially noted for virility of thought and valor of action, becoming known as the Volunteer State, as a native chivalry quickly proffered service in every emergency and a natural eloquence, mountain born, made her sons sought as orators. A preacher who could not preach or a politician who could not speak were as rare as birds which could not sing.

Slavery was coexistent with the State, but was largely patriarchal in character; the slaves spoken of as "my people" or "the blacks" or, colloquially, as "the darkies", which was an affectionate term. Cabins were built for them in the quarters, where they grew certain truck and raised fowls to sell as they pleased. There was an obligation felt toward them more as dependent children; they were housed, fed, and clothed and their spiritual and mental welfare not neglected.

The teaching on Sabbath afternoons largely devolved upon the mistress and her daughters, and with their retentive memories the colored pupils quickly absorbed the gospel truths; and many an old plantation preacher, though he could not read, almost knew the Bible by heart, as they did the old-time hymns, from which evolved the so-called spirituals, some of them of true conviction—not the spurious ones attributed to them today.

I recall in my childhood quavering old voices singing variations of old hymns and being crooned to sleep in old black arms with

"Yo may tak me to de Eas',
Yo may tak me to de Wes';
But I'll heah de trumpet soun' in dat day"— and then, in a mumble to herself, "Ole Mis' done taught me dat."

Such care was attested to by the devotion of the Negroes during the War between the States, instances of which are too well known and authenticated ever to be disputed; the body of many a young Confederate soldier was brought back "to de ole place" by the faithful black comrade of his youth, who had accompanied him to the war.

And in many a family graveyard will be found, resting by "ole Marse" and "ole Mis' ", the faithful black ones, between whom was a bond of devoted attachment.

The Scotch-Irish (or Ulster Scotch) in eastern Tennessee, although slaveholders by inheritance, were opposed to the system, and in that section efforts were made at abolition, before Garrison began his activities. Many of them freed their slaves and sent them to Liberia after that experiment was set up, in President Polk's administration, and kept up a correspondence with them as long as they lived, for contrary to the usual opinion, some of the house-reared servants could read and write after a fashion.

The women of Tennessee have always been homemakers; they rose up early and ate not the bread of idleness; they became notable housekeepers, and were satisfied to be the helpmeets of husbands who were known within the gates, but from earliest times were distinguished for daring and individuality of thought when occasion demanded.

There was Katherine Sherrill, leaping like a young doe over the stockade at Watauga, when pursued by the Indians; Mrs. McEwen quickly remolding the bullets fired by the Indians and sending them back to them; and Elizabeth Rhea, writing her young soldier son on the high hills of Santee: "I would rather hear that you were numbered among the slain defending our sacred cause, than know that you proved profligate or a coward", an injunction so well heeded that later Matthew Rhea bore a commission as major, signed by Gen. George Washington, and you do not wonder that the descendents of such women were with Sevier at Kings Mountain, Jackson at New Orleans, over the walls at Chapultepec, through the tense agony of the War between the States, and the long, long trail of the World War.

There was a love of home among the Tennesseeans more than common. An early English traveler wrote that he had never encountered people of any State so homesick when removed from its bounds.

Many of the customs were transplanted from Scotland and the songs as well, also that love of books and fervor for education. On the rude shelves in many a pioneer cabin stood the calf-bound classics, old Elzevirs and early copies of The Word, brought out from the old home, in saddle bags across the mountains.

An early and beloved custom was the "infare", which was the reception for the young bride at the home of the groom's parents; she wore her white dress at her wedding in her parents' home, but her "second-day" dress, usually of dark silk, was as carefully selected, for it was worn at the "infare" where she was always anxious to make a good impression among the new relatives since she had "fared out" from the home of her childhood.

The care of the "wee bairn" was another pronounced custom, and the high chair was more carefully made than any other. There were few homes so unfortunate as to have no little ones, but where there were none the custom prevailed of "borrowing the baby"—some trusted member of the family would come early to beg the more fortunate neighbor to lend the baby for the day.

But always before sunset, across the fields and meadow, would come the mother to get her child; and as night fell the question always was: "Are the children all in?"

In 1896 Tennessee celebrated her one hundredth anniversary, and a great State came into her own.

Her sons and daughters came from far and wide to observe the centennial and were welcomed by a native-born Governor, the beloved Robert Love Taylor, whose forebears were at Watauga, Kings Mountain, and New Orleans.

It was a far cry from the log cabin in the wilderness to the gleaming walls of the Parthenon, reproduced in size and scale for Tennessee's centennial, but it had all been wrought well and by worthy builders.

ADMINISTRATION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE—ADDRESS BY ATTORNEY GENERAL CUMMINGS

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address on the subject Progress Toward a Modern Administration of Criminal Justice in the United States, delivered by the Attorney General of the United States, Hon. Homer Cummings, at the annual meeting of the North Carolina Conference for Social Service, at Durham, N. C., April 27, 1936.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The subject we are to consider tonight is of such wide philosophic interest and involves so many problems of practical consequences that I can do no more in a brief discussion than touch upon its fringes. That I should be speaking upon such a topic to a State conference on social service illustrates in somewhat striking fashion the trend of present thought in this important field. I am glad to participate in your deliberations because your organization is rightly regarded not only as one of the most forward looking but as one that from year to year has made vital contributions to the improvement of legislation and administrative procedure.

The political philosophy dominant in this country at the time of the Declaration of Independence emphasized, as of primary importance, the individual rights of man as distinguished from the requirements of organized society. It was natural that this concept should have been uppermost in the minds of our forefathers. Government in the countries from which they came had been largely oppressive in character. The criminal law there administered was frequently employed as a whip to compel obedience upon the part of reluctant, if not recalcitrant, subjects. Most of the early colonists came to America to escape the compulsions of arbitrary laws which seemed to them unwarranted interferences with their religious, political, and social beliefs. Moreover, the country to which they came was a wilderness in which each individual lived largely on his own responsibility. In the small clusters of population which constituted the first communities only the most primitive forms of governmental structure were possible. Until comparatively recent years there has always been a frontier beyond which the restless could find escape. It was natural, therefore, that in the building up of our laws, particularly those which related to crime and punishment, there should have been a sharp emphasis on the rights of the individual and a constant resistance to any form of social control which seemed to involve a limitation upon individual activity.

In the early days, the scope of criminal law was relatively narrow. The prevailing conditions of life made unnecessary the elaborate present-day structure of criminal statutes. Such crimes as were committed were, of course, matters of vital consequence to the localities in which they occurred. The courthouse was a center of community interest and court day was an occasion for the assembling of the populace from the far corners of the country. When a murder was committed it was of such general concern as to disrupt the quiet of the countryside and to warrant the calling out of all available resources for the capture and punishment of the criminal. In fact, it was a matter of such moment that, in the absence of an effective local government, vigilante groups were active and methods of hue and cry and outlawry were employed.

It was under these circumstances, then, that there grew up in our constitutions and laws, the system of judicial determination which we know so well and which guarantees to each person charged with the commission of a crime, the right to counsel, the right to a day in court, the right to a jury trial, the right to have witnesses subpenaed in his behalf, the right to be tried only upon an indictment found by a grand jury, the right to bail, the right to employ the writ of habeas corpus, the right of the presumption of innocence, the right to be present at his own trial and to be faced by the witnesses who testified against him, the right to be convicted only upon proof beyond reasonable doubt, the right of appeal, and the rest of the elaborate formulae. Every law student was taught that it is better for 99 guilty men to escape than that one innocent man should be punished. In modern days these wholesome processes and sound guaranties have far too often been debauched and diverted from their original purpose.

It was but natural that we were led into many grievous difficulties of administration.

Criminal laws were frequently enacted to satisfy the wishes of interested minority groups or in response to tempests of popular emotion. Moreover, this confusion was increased by the fact that not only the Federal Government, but each State and each political subdivision thereof was possessed of large power to define crimes and to fix penalties.

The Federal criminal law, as a system distinct from that of the States, followed two major lines of development. One had to do with the control of territories directly administered by the Federal Government. The other body of law was concerned with such problems as treason, piracy, sedition, interference with the mails, the collection of internal revenue, and other purely Federal functions.

Let us not forget that the development of the United States has produced certain phenomena peculiar to ourselves which present problems of the most varied and baffling character. There came to our shores a heterogeneous population, bearing within itself national strains and racial traits that were to contribute to the cosmopolitan character of American life, but which, at the same time, could not be welded into a common pattern of behavior without subjecting our new citizens to many of the compulsions which their arrival on these shores was designed to avoid. The mere territorial extent of our domain, while affording opportunities for the assertion of the vigor of the pioneer, at the same time subjected the influence of law and order to a process of indefinite attenuation. Industrial and manufacturing communities, great centers of population and of enterprise, grew up, each with its particular texture, atmosphere, and standards of public morals. Between some of these large centers the greater part of Europe might have been superimposed with room still left for an almost uninhabited frontier. There came into existence 48 States, each sovereign within its own jurisdiction, each with its own capital, each with its own government, and each with a population drawn together through some common interest in the natural or human advantages of its peculiar environment. The Federal Government, established through fiat on the banks of the Potomac, isolated with conscious purpose from the great centers of population, trade, manufacturing, business, and industrial life, bore a relationship of limited and delicate character toward all of these other units.

Out of this relationship, fixed in our Constitution, and out of the great impulses that created the drama of our material conquest of this continent have arisen intricate problems in the administration of human relationships that confront us all at this hour. Of these problems, the administration of criminal justice is one of the most fundamental.

The dangerous inroads that organized crime was making were apparent on every hand and finally reached a climax in a notorious series of kidnapings that brought the issue into the focus of national attention. To put it bluntly, we had outgrown our law-enforcement system and it had broken down under the strain.

Many of us felt that in the premises a heavy responsibility rested upon the Federal Government and that means could be devised to meet it within the limitations of the Constitution, and without doing violence to the genius of our institutions or the customs of our people.

The first significant appearance of the Federal Government in this field took place when the so-called Lindbergh Antikidnaping Act was passed in June 1932. While this was an excellent beginning, it dealt somewhat inadequately with but a single class of crime. It was imperative that the Federal authorities should be empowered to go much further.

Between Federal and State jurisdictions there existed a kind of twilight zone, a sort of neutral corridor, unpoliced and unprotected, in which criminals of the most desperate character found an area of relative safety. It was the unholy sanctuary of predatory vice. Here the instructed criminal sought and found refuge. It was into that zone that the Federal Government has sought to enter. We have resisted, and we shall resist, all attempts to bring the Department of Justice into the sphere of State or local criminal activities. Frankly, I have endeavored to develop in the Department of Justice a structure and a technique predicated upon cooperation with State and local agencies, as well as with appropriate semi-public groups, toward the accomplishment of the common end—the eradication of crime in its more outrageous and organized phases and the progressive control of the rest.

It was therefore from no desire to usurp the functions of State or local authorities that the Department of Justice requested from the Congress and secured authority to deal with this difficult situation. There was introduced in the Seventy-third Congress what has been termed the "12-point program of the Department of Justice", which ultimately resulted in the passage of 21 important enactments.

Throughout these difficult and formative days the Congress and its committees rendered every assistance in their power; and I pay grateful tribute to them for their unfailing confidence and support.

In order to assist the States in developing a more effective program of Nation-wide cooperation, I sponsored the adoption by the Congress of a law authorizing interstate compacts for mutual cooperation in the prevention and punishment of crime. The passage of this law has already stimulated wide interest in a hitherto unused means of approach. An Interstate Commission on Crime has been formed, composed of members representing every State in the Union; and a comprehensive program of legislation is in process of development.

The other enactments dealt with racketeering, transportation of stolen property where the value exceeded $5,000, extensions of the kidnaping statute, flight from one State to another to avoid prosecution or the giving of testimony in felony cases, bank robberies, killing or assaulting a Federal officer, riot in or escape from a Federal penal institution, taxation upon the manufacture or sale of submachine guns and certain other types of firearms, the right of agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to carry firearms and to make arrests, improvements in criminal procedure, rewards, and similar matters. These beneficial and constructive acts were carefully worked out and served as an answer to a great national need. Moreover, the Congress wisely provided additional appropriations for equipment, personnel, laboratories, scientific apparatus, and the like.

The immediate result of these various acts and measures was to enable the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice to deal successfully with a series of outrageous kidnapings, and to put an end to the operations of many notorious murderers, gangsters, bank robbers, and hold-up men, whose activities had made American justice a subject of wonder to the rest of the world. The Federal authorities confronted a desperate situation and, I am proud to say, met it in a manner that received national and even international commendation. Encouraging as these events were, thoughtful persons realized that much remained to be done.

With that thought in mind, I summoned to meet at Washington, D. C., in the winter of 1934, a conference on crime, based upon a new method of approach. Theretofore the public, expressing itself through conferences or otherwise, had appealed to the public authorities for aid in dealing with the menace of lawlessness. Now the process was about to be reversed—the Government was to appeal to the public for its thoughtful advice, for its sustained interest, and for its active help.

Attended by 600 delegates, each an expert in his own field, the conference sought to approach the question in as dispassionate, as objective, and as practical a manner as possible; to consider crime in the light of the experience of the participating groups, without at the same time getting into the field of particular crimes, specialized suggestions, and minute professional preoccupations.

This gathering, I believe, elicited an unusually valuable exposition of basic facts and was of great assistance in enabling the public to see the problem of crime in its broader aspects and to see it whole. Since that time a number of State conferences of a similar nature have been held. Many things are afoot. The psychology of our people has undergone a wholesome change. No longer does the public glorify the gangster. Its admiration and its gratitude go out to those who, daily taking their lives in their hands, seek to enforce the laws that are our common protection.

Public opinion has begun to express itself in many ways. It is not an opinion that impinges alone upon the Federal Government. If I mistake not the signs, it is beginning to affect all governmental authorities throughout the Nation, whether their jurisdiction be great or small. There is a demand for action in each particular jurisdiction for the most expert coordination of which the authorities are capable. These large expectations should find an unreserved welcome on the part of law-enforcement officials, for there is thus provided the encouragement and stimulation necessary to such an administration of justice as befits the dignity of American life.

With respect to the practical recommendations of that conference time does not permit me to offer a discussion except to state that one of the important actions taken was that approving the establishment at Washington, D. C., of a scientific and educational center to provide national leadership in the broad field of criminal law administration and the treatment of crime and criminals. The Advisory Committee which I appointed to consider this recommendation approved the creation of the proposed center within the structure of the Department of Justice, and it was decided to use the existing facilities of the Department for this purpose.

For several years, under the guidance of its skilled Director, Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, there had been in successful operation in the Federal Bureau of Investigation an excellent training school for the instruction of special agents whose high personnel standards are too well known to require comment on this occasion. It was decided to make that training course, with suitable adaptations, available to selected law-enforcement officials throughout the United States.

The first police training school was held in the summer of 1935, and a second group of law-enforcement officers was graduated a short time ago. Plant, technical equipment, scientific facilities, lecturers, and instructors are made available for this important work. The sole expense to those who take these courses is the cost of transportation to and from Washington, and of personal maintenance during the period of instruction. The Department cannot, of course, offer these advantages indiscriminately, but it can and does undertake to supply to a limited number of experienced police officials instruction in all of the manifold scientific and technical subjects in which special agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation are now trained. In this way we both teach and learn.

We have followed the subsequent careers of the graduates of this school. Many of them, promoted in rank and given increased compensation, are now passing on this instruction to their colleagues and subordinates in various States and local police jurisdictions. The results thus far have been highly satisfactory.

Under the Federal Bureau of Prisons of the Department of Justice there has been set up a classified prison system which includes a reformatory for women; two reformatories for youthful first offenders; a special institution for the treatment of narcotic addicts; the United States Hospital for Defective Delinquents at Springfield, Mo., where remarkable rehabilitative work is being done with the insane and tuberculous, as well as those suffering with chronic, degenerative diseases; four regional jails; five prison camps; four walled penitentiaries; and finally, on Alcatraz Island, a maximum security prison for persistently intractable prisoners and those with serious records of violent crimes. Supplementing the classification program there is a carefully conceived procedure for the individual study and treatment of inmates in each institution.

In the selection of personnel, both at Washington and in the field, the Federal Bureau of Prisons has recognized the importance of professionalizing the service. A comprehensive plan of in-service training for the custodial officers is now being put into operation, and in the future all promotions and salary raises will be made upon the basis of the completion of the training requirements as well as the maintenance of satisfactory service records. Not only does the proposed scheme offer an opportunity for developing the best qualities in candidates for the position of prison officer, but it also assures to them something in the nature of a career service.

This training course for Federal prison officials now maintained under the experienced direction of Mr. Sanford Bates, Director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, can, I hope, be made available under proper conditions to selected State and other officers in this field. While this is a difficult arrangement to work out, it is being given serious study.

Probation, as a device for penal treatment and for the protection of society, has been widely developed under the Federal system and with increasingly satisfactory results. Although the appointment of probation officers is, under the law, left to the discretion and authority of the United States district judges, the administrative, instructional, and inspectional phases of the probation system as a whole have been placed under the Director of the Bureau of Prisons, on whose staff there is a highly competent Supervisor of Probation.

Persons sentenced in the Federal courts to terms of more than 1 year are, under the law, eligible for parole when they have served one-third of the full sentence. The decision as to whether parole shall be granted and when it shall be effective rests with the United States Board of Parole, consisting of three members appointed by the Attorney General. The Board has its headquarters in Washington, but regular hearings are held at the various institutions.

In general, it may be said that parole is granted when, in the judgment of the Board, a prisoner is competent and willing to readjust himself socially and when the factors which will affect him and his family after release guarantee adequate public security. A definite "parole plan", which includes suitable employment and an approved "local adviser", together with such other conditions as the Board thinks necessary for the protection of society, must be submitted for the approval of the Board before release on parole is actually effective. The details of all such parole plans must be verified by field investigations made by an accredited social-service agency or by a United States probation officer.

One of the most important phases of our crime problem is that of the care and treatment of juvenile offenders. Under a statute passed for that purpose there has been established a special policy for dealing with those under 19 years of age who violate Federal laws. A person trained and experienced in the work of dealing with youthful offenders has been assigned to the further development of this policy. Distinct and gratifying progress is being made in this field, the importance of which cannot be overemphasized. If we can perfect our own system, it will have a stimulating effect in every State in the Union.

There has been much discussion as to the relative merits and results of various methods of parole. Unfortunately, we suffer from a woeful lack of reliable information.

Because of the variations existing among the statutes and practices of the several jurisdictions I became convinced that a Nation-wide survey should be made and that it should also include within its scope pardon, probation, commutation, suspended sentences, and related subjects. With these considerations in mind I procured funds for such an inquiry from the Works Progress Administration. During the following weeks, under the direction of Mr. Justin Miller, a former president of this conference and a member of the staff of the Department of Justice, a group of trained workers was sent into the field to initiate the undertaking. Such a survey has never heretofore been undertaken. It is in the nature of a large but promising experiment. We are receiving excellent cooperation in the various States, and the compiled results will be made available to all who are interested in the subject. Perhaps at last we are in a fair way to come to grips with the vexing problem of parole.

I am persuaded that as time goes on our national program must place an increasing emphasis upon crime prevention. Here is a great field which many people, either because of inadequate information or lack of imagination, are reluctant to enter. In this area, as in the matter of detection and apprehension, as well as of punishment and rehabilitation, the Federal Government owes a duty of leadership. With only a moderate extension of activities, the Department of Justice can be made a nerve center of helpful impulses and a clearing house of useful information. The chief reliance, however, will naturally be placed upon scientific groups, universities, and training schools, many forms of industrial, business, and social agencies, and the States and local governments. Here again cooperation is the key word if we are to have a unified and coordinated program.

During recent months there has been a tremendous increase in the activities of various agencies all along the line. In several universities courses of training have been provided for improving the personnel of police administration. Chambers of commerce and municipal leagues have been engaged in similar programs. Fraternal and religious organizations, women's societies, the Boy Scouts, and other groups have been helpfully active. The movement to establish and extend boys' clubs, playgrounds, and the like, is in line with the desired end. The American Bar Association, as well as the various State and local bar associations, have been carrying on an intensive program, particularly for the improvement of laws relating to procedure and administration. The important work of the American Law Institute in the preparation of a model code of criminal procedure is one of the most striking of recent achievements.

The American Judicature Society, the American Institute of Criminal Law and Criminology, the International Association of Chiefs of Police, the National Probation Association, the American Prison Association, and many other organizations, have made substantial progress in forwarding their respective programs of action. The creation of juvenile courts and coordinating councils, proposals for State departments of justice, and State police departments all merit careful attention and promise rich results. In short, we are slowly but surely developing a national program and an adequate public leadership.

When one speaks of leadership one speaks, perhaps, of the most essential single factor in our entire program. On another occasion I made this assertion:

"Much has been said about the importance of an informed public opinion. This aspect of the matter is not for a moment to be underrated; but all too often public officials are content merely to lecture the citizen for his alleged indifference to the duties which inhere in citizenship. This seems to me to be somewhat less than fair and an altogether too convenient escape from the responsibilities which rest upon the public officials themselves. Our people have placed such officials in key positions of power and trust and have a right to expect that their high responsibilities will be faithfully and efficiently discharged.

"Our experience has shown that what might have appeared to be public indifference was largely the apathy of the disillusioned, resulting from the frequent failure of public authorities to supply the service and the type of leadership to which the American people are entitled. Once a reasonable course of action has been projected and representatives of Federal, State, and local interests have been brought together for concerted action, public opinion is inspiringly spontaneous in its support of the common objective."

There is no magic formula for the solution of the problem of crime, and, with our human frailties, no perfect administration of criminal justice is apt to be devised. But all of us, each in his own field and each maintaining cooperative contact with the others, can contribute to our common purpose. That objective, if I understand the temper of the American people, is to put into effect a program for crime control scientifically conceived, broadly based and adapted to modern conditions of life and government.

Such a program must include, among other essential elements, compassion for the unfortunate, instrumentalities to guide those in danger of antisocial contaminations, solicitude for first offenders, rehabilitation where rehabilitation is possible, progressively improved procedures, prompt detection and apprehension followed by the swift and inevitable punishment of the guilty, vigorous and understanding administration, unfaltering resistance to political interference, and the raising of the personnel in this great field of human relationships to unimpeachable standards of individual character and professional competence. Without such a program to guide us, progress at best will be intermittent and wavering, but with its aid the American people can put their house in order and go about their ways of living under conditions of domestic peace.

ACTIVITIES OF RESETTLEMENT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon we were subjected, as I see it, to as vivid an indication of either fear, on the one hand, or pique or unfairness, on the other, as has been exhibited in the Senate for a long period. Senators will remember that while the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] was discussing an amendment which he offered to the resolution which was submitted by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and adopted by the Senate, the distinguished leader of the majority asked him to please suspend so that the amendment itself could be read and Senators would know to what the discussion was being directed. Prior to that, Mr. President, I had followed exactly that procedure, a procedure which had not been followed by my distinguished friends on the other side of the aisle, who were permitted, without interruption, to discuss at length amendments offered by them and to have them incorporated in the resolution, as was done in each instance.

In the case of my amendment, Mr. President, when I sent it to the desk and it was read, the distinguished leader of the majority, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], immediately arose in his seat and moved to lay the amendment on the table, thus eliminating all discussion, explanation, or debate. It was significant, I think, that, even despite the fact that the Senator from Arkansas was the author of that motion, the amendment offered by me received 30 votes and only 32 votes were cast against it, and among those who voted not to table the amendment offered by me were a number of distinguished Senators on the other side of the aisle. Yesterday afternoon I purposely did not make any statement or explanation of the amendment or otherwise make mention of the course which was adopted by the majority toward the amendment, for the reason that I felt too keenly interested in the resolution of the Senator from Michigan inadvertently to incur any further evidence of wrath on the part of those on the other side of the aisle, and thus possibly to militate against the adoption of the resolution. However, I now wish to say at least a few of the things that I was ruthlessly denied an opportunity to say yesterday. I shall speak in no personal spirit, as I am sure all Senators know, for I hold the distinguished Senator from Arkansas in the high esteem to which he is entitled.

Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas to whom I have referred made the statement that the amendments offered by myself and others were not germane to the resolution. True, he qualified that by saying he realized there are no rules of the Senate which require germaneness. If I may be permitted to refer to the amendments of our friends on the other side of the aisle, I can demonstrate that there could not be any more clear-cut or vivid examples of nongermaneness.

One amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] asked for the names of corporations having statutory net incomes of $1,000,000 or more, together with benefits derived from the tariff. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] offered another amendment asking for the names of corporations benefiting to the extent of $100,000 a year or more from the tariff during the last 3 years. In addition to that, the Connally amendment sought publicity specifically with reference to corporations benefiting by the tariff on aluminum, steel, cameras and films, chemicals and dyes, electric appliances, and tin.

If anyone can trace the most remote connection between those undertakings and the undertaking of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], I should like to have him enlighten me. As a matter of fact, I had no objection to those amendments and the Senator from Michigan had none. I can only say that the amendment which I offered requesting needed information concerning the Resettlement Administration was a very innocuous and simple undertaking as compared to what I had originally intended. I can appreciate the justification, perhaps, of advancing the feeling that the various amendments came as surprises. They all came perhaps as surprises, but in the case of my own amendment I should like to point out that on March 11 I submitted Senate Resolution 248 calling for a special committee to investigate the Resettlement Administration. That resolution provided for paying expenses of the committee up to $25,000 from the contingent fund of the Senate, and afforded an opportunity to subpena witnesses and question them, and to have produced books, papers, and documents. In brief, in my resolution of March 11 there was set up the machinery for a complete and thorough investigation.

The amendment which I offered yesterday was my original resolution to which I have just referred with all the teeth drawn. The amendment merely requested the Resettlement Administration to report to the Senate the information sought in the original resolution. There was no machinery at all provided for investigating the Resettlement Administration. That agency, under my amendment, could have answered anything it pleased. I offered the amendment in that form in the hope that it would be adopted and might elicit some of the information which I had sought.

The reason why I feel that the whole undertaking should be investigated has been emphasized, in my humble judgment, by the speedy denial of any character of investigation of any sort, type, or description.

Now, I should like to give the Senate certain pertinent facts in this connection which I think are very enlightening. I quote from an article by Felix Bruner, which appeared in the Washington Post of February 10:

Occupying all or parts of 19 Washington buildings—ranging from the palatial former home of a millionaire to temporary Government structures—are the administrative directors and staff of one of the most far-flung experiments in paternalistic government ever attempted in the United States.

This organization, which is really a government within the Government, was not created by an act of Congress but by an Executive order of the President. Its activities do not require congressional sanction or approval. It directly affects, virtually rules, the lives of hundreds of thousands of people who are told how much they can spend for food, for clothing, for rent; what crops they shall plant; how they shall conduct the most minute details of their lives.

Administering this huge experiment are 13,045 men and women, all on the Federal pay roll, but none of them under civil service.

There is not one of these Government employees who is not being paid out of the relief funds voted by the Congress, and each one of them takes the place of someone who would be getting relief if it were not for this great mushroom bureau into which we are not to be allowed to inquire.

Quoting further from Mr. Bruner:

The activities of the Resettlement Administration are so varied, take so many directions, that there is no possibility of characterizing its work. In a measure, it is interested in relief. But that is only part of its program. It ranges from buying a mule for a farmer to building houses for industrial workers; from establishing game preserves to encouraging formation of cooperative organizations to can beans.

The Resettlement Administration is an outgrowth of the $4,880,000,000 Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, but it is not specifically mentioned in the act. The law gave President Roosevelt almost unlimited powers to spend the relief money. In turn, the President gave Tugwell equally unlimited powers to spend a considerable chunk of it. These latter powers were given in a series of Executive orders, two of which are of outstanding importance.

The first order was dated April 30, 1935. It gave the Resettlement Administration these powers:

(a) To administer approved projects involving resettlement of destitute or low-income families from rural and urban areas, including the establishment, maintenance, and operation, in such connection, of communities in rural and suburban areas.

FOUR IMPORTANT WORDS

(b) To initiate and administer a program of approved projects with respect to soil erosion, stream pollution, seacoast erosion, reforestation, forestation, and flood control.

(c) To make loans as authorized under the said Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 to finance, in whole or in part, the purchase of farm lands and necessary equipment by farmers, farm tenants, croppers, or farm laborers.

This order was widely publicized. But the second of the two important orders, dated September 26, 1935, passed unnoticed. It looked like a perfunctory document, but it was far from that. It repeated the paragraphs just quoted but it added four words to paragraph (b). The words were:

"* * * and other useful projects."

Those four words gave Tugwell the power to "initiate and administer" anything.

Congress had delegated to the President and the President had delegated to Tugwell almost every power possessed by both except the power to declare war.

I have a copy of the Executive order, and I shall read it a little later, but in the meantime I want to turn to some other facts which I think will give some conception of the enormity of the bureau which has grown from this undertaking.

I should like, if I could, to find out from someone what has been the result of all this expense and undertaking. I can tell my colleagues, and will tell them later on in a brief way, the results I have seen in the State of New Jersey.

Here is an article that appeared in the Washington Star of March 12:

If work lags in the Resettlement Administration and there are delays, the fault cannot be attributed to any lack of assistants.

A survey of the set-up in that organization reveals that Professor Tugwell is aided by Assistant Administrator W. W. Alexander, also Assistant to the Administrator F. P. Bartlett, Assistant Administrator C. B. Baldwin, Executive Assistant Grace E. Falke, Assistant to Executive Assistant M. E. Gilfond, Special Assistant to Administrator G. S. Mitchell, Assistant to Assistant Administrator R. I. Kimmel, Special Assistant to Administrator L. I. Hewes, Special Assistant to Administrator Brooks Hays, Special Assistant to Administrator R. A. Pearson, Assistant Administrator L. C. Gray, Assistant Administrator C. C. Taylor, Assistant Administrator J. L. Dailey, Assistant Administrator E. E. Agger, Assistant Administrator J. S. Lansill, General Counsel Lee Pressman, Chief of the Correspondence Section Anne McIntyre, and Chief of Mail and Files F. B. Oppenborn.

A letter written by a farmer in Virginia "goes in" through Mr. Oppenborn, "goes 'round" in an upward and then in a downward spiral to and from Professor Tugwell, and finally "comes out" to Mr. Oppenborn again. By that conclusive moment there has been some reasonable delay. Every single one of approximately 3,300 employees may have had a crack at it. At best, it has wandered in a labyrinthian maze of administrators and assistants.

It may also have journeyed up and down any of 16 different divisions. There are such sectional departments as business management, captained by A. B. Thatcher; investigation, A. C. Bachrach; personnel, Winston B. Stephens; procedure, Warren Bruner; construction, Frank Schmitt; rural resettlement, W. A. Packard; management (as distinct from business management), John O. Walker; information, J. F. Carter; land utilization, L. C. Gray; rural rehabilitation, Paul V. Maris; urban resettlement (as distinct from rural), J. S. Lansill; labor relations, Mercer G. Evans; legal, Monroe Oppenheimer; finance and control, Max J. Wasserman; special plans, Robert A. Schroeder, and special skills, Adrian J. Dornbush.

Or the theoretical epistle may have been routed to any of a dozen regional offices, located in New Haven, Conn.; Madison, Wis.; Champaign, Ill.; Raleigh, N. C.; Montgomery, Ala.; Little Rock, Ark.; Lincoln, Nebr.; Dallas, Tex.; Berkeley, Calif.; Denver, Colo.; Portland, Oreg., and Amarillo, Tex.

Again, it may have circulated through no less than 27 different buildings in Washington. The resettlement family divides its patronage among 1333 F Street, Fourteenth and the Mall, 1025 Vermont Avenue, 910 Seventeenth Street, Fourteenth and New York Avenue, 927 Fifteenth Street, 1724 F Street, 1320 G Street, 1322 New York Avenue, 1420 New York Avenue, 510 Twenty-sixth Street, Eighteenth and Pennsylvania Avenue, 1410 H Street, 916 G Street, Seventh and I Streets, 821 Fifteenth Street, Fifteenth and New York Avenue, 801 G Street, 1503 Twenty-first Street, Fourteenth and Independence Avenue, Seventh and the Mall, 2020 Massachusetts Avenue, 501 Twenty-sixth Street, Fifteenth and G Streets, 1328 G Street, 1727 L Street, and 2216 M Street. If laid heel to toe in a straight line, the perfectly good shoes worn out tramping from one office to another would reach from the Nation's Capital to Whoosis in Siberia.

A little earlier in my remarks I mentioned that here in Washington this enormous Bureau occupied 19 buildings. Between the date of that first item of information and the date of this later information it has spread to 27 buildings, and I have in my hand a record of the addresses and locations of each of these 27 buildings.

I think it may interest Senators to know that the Resettlement Administration has gotten out a special telephone directory of its own. In other words, I am trying sincerely to prove, if I can, with the indulgence of the Senate, that I am not inquiring into some slight and insignificant or passing undertaking of the Government, but into one of the very largest, though least known or understood, activities of the Government; or, perhaps, I should say the New Deal.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; I am very glad to yield.

Mr. CAREY. The Senator stated that there were some 13,000 employees of the Resettlement Administration. I should like to ask if that many persons have been put on homesteads or located.

Mr. BARBOUR. That is one of the things I should like to find out definitely. I have my convictions about that, but I want the true facts.

Mr. CAREY. I wondered if there were not more employees than persons who had been put on the homesteads.

Mr. BARBOUR. I am quite sure there are many times more employees in the Bureau itself than persons who have been put at work or accommodated in any capacity in any of these resettlement undertakings; that is my definite impression and opinion. What I should like to know is whether or not that is so.

I, of course, am not going to attempt to read the telephone book to Senators, but I should like to go through some of its groupings, with the number of subdivisions in each:

Resettlement Administration Divisional Codes, 17.

Buildings occupied by Resettlement Administration, as I have said before, 27, with their various telephones and addresses.

Divisional Files, 30.

Administrative Staff, 14.

Business Management, including space as one of the designations, 7. I myself have been a businessman, and I should not want any softer job than to manage space.

Investigation, 6.

Personnel, 6.

Procedure, 10.

Construction, 10.

Rural Resettlement, 10.

Management, 9.

Information, 9.

Land Utilization, 6.

Rural Rehabilitation, 8.

Suburban Resettlement, 7.

Labor Relations, 5.

Legal, 11.

Finance and Control, 29.

Special Plans, 2.

Special Skills, 8.

Then, in addition, come 84 pages, with 50 names to the page, of miscellaneous employees in the District of Columbia alone, totaling 4,200 names and telephone numbers.

I do not know that I can properly charge intentional secrecy to the Resettlement Administration, but I do know that each and every report I have been able to get—and they are meager—is marked "Confidential." We pride ourselves in America that our Government is conducted in the open; that we have nothing to conceal from our people—yet options are secured from private landowners for resettlement projects, not in the name of the Government but ostensibly for private parties. This procedure is apparent in the Report on the Works Program, March 16, 1936, which states that five suburban resettlement projects have been approved. It names four of these, and the report states that there is "one other site which has not yet been announced." The report continues:

Work on the four projects mentioned has been started, and options on the land for the other are being secured.

Another element about which I think we are entitled to information, if we are entitled to information any longer in the Senate of the United States, is that in relation to expenditures.

From the Report on the Works Program, March 16, 1936, page 55, I give verbatim the following:

By December 15, 1935, a total of $196,070,000 had been allotted to the Administration, of which nearly $100,000,000 will be used for work projects, $7,000,000 for the completion of homesteads, $31,000,000 for suburban developments, $15,000,000 for land development (made available by W. P. A.), and $47,000,000 for construction on resettlement projects. Of the remainder, $44,000,000 was allotted for rehabilitation, $7,420,000 for relief in stricken agricultural areas, $22,000,000 for purchase of land, $2,000,000 for farm-debt adjustment, and $20,650,000 for administration.

This last item is very significant—$20,650,000 out of $196,000,000. In other words, more than 10 percent of the cost of this undertaking goes to administration alone; and the bulk of that cost is for purchases—acquisition of properties. That, I myself have been able to garner, and those are the official figures. But no; the Senate must not have any detailed information so far as this undertaking of the Government is concerned. We went along very nicely here yesterday in respect to other requests for information until I stepped on Professor Tugwell's toes. Then there was a very distinct change in the whole situation; a definite change in attitude.

I spoke a while ago of the Executive orders which make possible this great, terribly expensive, and far-reaching undertaking. There is no statute that calls for it. There is no law which prescribes it. Those who operate it may do exactly as they please, and they now do not have to give the information that the Senate asks them to give.

Executive Order No. 7027, issued April 30, 1935, and Executive Order No. 7200, issued on September 26, 1935, amending Executive Order No. 7027, established the Resettlement Administration and prescribed its functions and duties. These two orders provided that the Resettlement Administration was "to administer approved projects involving rural rehabilitation, relief in stricken agricultural areas, and resettlement of destitute or low-income families from rural and urban areas, including the establishment, maintenance, and operation, in such connection, of communities in rural and suburban areas." They further provided that it shall "initiate and administer a program of approved projects with respect to soil erosion, stream pollution, seacoast erosion, reforestation, forestation, flood control, and other useful projects." That of itself is an omnibus grant of unlimited power if there ever was one, and gives latitude for anything.

To proceed further, authorization for making loans under the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, "in whole or in part, for the purchase of farm lands and necessary equipment by farmers, farm tenants, croppers, or farm laborers" is contained in the same Executive order.

This bureaucratic monster, which may lap up half the vacant mansions in Washington, was created by no act of Congress but by a couple of Executive orders.

Professor Tugwell, the Administrator of the Resettlement Administration, is, of course, responsible only to the President himself. He is answerable only to the President; and, as I have now found out, his reports, which are confidential—and I take it when they are sent to me marked "confidential" they are not for public use—are meager, and now we cannot get anything in any other form at all.

If some other Senator can get this information, if any Representative can get it, I, of course, will be very glad indeed to have him do so. I have made my effort and have been unsuccessful; so I desire to emphasize again that I feel complimented, under the circumstances, if any Senator did vote for my amendment feeling that this undertaking was justified, especially in the very moderate nonexacting terms of the amendment which I apparently had the temerity to offer to the resolution of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to give the Senator a specific example in my own experience indicating what I believe to be the necessity for the precise type of ventilation which the Senator seeks.

In connection with the Wisconsin resettlement projects, one farm, which is assessed for less than $5,000, has been optioned to the Government for $40,000. I have spent the last month trying to get specific information regarding that particular parcel. Yesterday I finally obtained a letter from Dr. Tugwell's department which undertook to demonstrate abstractly that the $5,000 farm was worth $40,000. He may be right. The point is that I have no way of finding out; neither has the Senator from New Jersey, neither has anyone else in the Government, except Dr. Tugwell's department itself, and when we are dealing with the enormous sums which are involved in this sort of an experiment, an experiment without precedence, it seems to me that it is elementary prudence to put a miscroscope on it. I think the Senator's resolution is utterly justified.

Mr. BARBOUR. I thank the Senator. The example he cites is not at all a lone example. There are many others. I would have preferred to have this whole inquiry take a very orderly course and have sought to be fair to the administration. There has not been a word of criticism from me heretofore. I wanted to give Dr. Tugwell and his horde of satellites an opportunity to tell us what they were doing. But, now that that is denied, I have to state why I undertook this inquiry. Frankly I am glad that I have been given, inadvertently perhaps, the chance to say what I am saying today.

There have been two undertakings in New Jersey, one quite an old one, near Hightstown. This originally was glowingly described as a sort of Utopia. It was to be a manufacturing community. There was to be erected a huge garment factory. There were to be 235 $3,000 houses surrounding it. There were to be sewage-disposal, light, heat, and water plants. Each house was to be surrounded by a sort of a little farm.

Speaking to the man in charge at the time—and he has been superseded by several others, so I cannot catch up with who is undertaking the job now—he told me there were to be, for instance, 100 cows. They were to be allotted very carefully among the 200 houses, each cow, I suppose, trained in the necessity of standing on the line between each two houses, one good lady from each household working on her side of the cow twice a day. Knowing something about cows, I told my friend, who was to go out and buy these cows and train them in that way, that he had a very difficult proposition on his hands.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey allow me to ask a question seeking information?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator from New Jersey feel free to say whether he has made an inquiry of the department, as a Senator, seeking governmental information which has been denied him?

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Illinois, who is always so courteous and fair. I have never obtained the full measure of information I have sought, I may say to the Senator. I have gotten certain "confidential" reports, as I said before, which I will be glad to show the Senator at any time. I am not trying to conceal anything. Those reports, in the first instance, were meager, and, in the second place, as I have said, were always marked "confidential."

Mr. LEWIS. I ask the Senator whether in some matter affecting a Government undertaking he has sought information which was denied him?

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I will be glad to go into the matter more specifically later on, because the Senator is entitled to a specific answer to a question very well justified, even if I have to do it on another day, but I can say that I feel I am not being unfair to the administration, nor am I clothing my answer in any subterfuge, when I state that I have not been able to get the information to which I feel I am justly entitled as a Senator.

Now, let me come back to the Hightstown project. I wish the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] or any of the other Senators would go there and have a look at that undertaking. If there ever was a chaotic mudhole with a few tin houses to glorify the money that has been spent, that is one example. I would warn Senators, however, if they desire to go there, to proceed cautiously, because the only people on the premises, apparently, are a kind of body of guards, who pop out on the scene and demand who you are and what business you have there. The people in the locality, regardless of party affiliations or any other consideration, have been vexed and annoyed by the whole thing. Local contractors have not been paid. It is all confusion, misunderstanding, and failure, and nothing to show of any consequence for all the money that has been wasted.

I do not know how much that undertaking has cost. I do not believe any Senator or Representative knows how much it has cost. I do not believe there has been an enlightening report on any of these undertakings. I can imagine what it would have cost had the whole proposition gone through. It would have cost many, many million dollars simply for the initial capital outlay. It was to be a factory to make clothing, as I said before, employing the heads of 200 families, with or without skill in the manufacture of clothing, who were to be selected in some way which was not disclosed, from undesignated communities.

After 25 years of business experience I know that if we were to undertake to make clothes by any such method as that, a set of rompers would cost $40 or $50. The same amount of money could be spent, if it is supposed to be spent for unemployment relief, to very much better advantage in some other way, and would have gone infinitely farther.

There is one other project in New Jersey which is in a very embryonic stage at present. It is at Bound Brook. Although the Bound Brook, N. J., suburban resettlement project is not fully complete even on paper, the Resettlement Administration has published a little pamphlet, a copy of which I have in my hand, to attract prospective householders. The front cover shows an attractive walk, with houses and trees. It sets forth the slogan repeated through the leaflet, "A garden home you can call your own." Of course, the homes are not to be the property of the people who will occupy them, if they are ever occupied, though the householders may contribute something in the way of rent.

On the inside the leaflet paints a fine picture of the future development, and I must say it sounds very attractive standing by itself. If I had not intimate personal knowledge of the failure of the other operation at Hightstown I might have more confidence that some success would attend this one. Anway, it is declared that it will bring $6,000,000 into the community, and it offers 3,000 jobs. It says to the towns surrounding Bound Brook that it will bring the "end of relief payments and the return of self-respect and work."

It states that these things will occur at no cost to the township or to neighboring communities.

On the last page are these statements:

To the average family of northern New Jersey the garden community will bring—

1. A new home at a rent you can afford to pay.
2. Modern conveniences: Electricity, sewers, running water, central heat, modern equipment at unusually low rates.
3. Elimination of traffic hazards for your children.
4. Parks, recreation facilities, community buildings, good neighbors, highest American standards.
5. Breathing space, healthy country air, and attractive community life in which your children may grow.

These are highly desirable features which would appeal to families of modest income. I submit, however, that any prospectus advertising stocks, for instance, backed by a nonexistent company, if printed, would be banned by Securities Exchange Commission.

Here, however, there is no complete project; I know there is no complete project. I know the undertaking is in a formative stage and has an indistinct status; but the Government of the United States offers the people of my State these unbuilt homes with cheap rent, heat, water power, and all the rest of it. How can one reconcile that promise on the one hand with the failure of performance not many miles away under the same management?

No one is more sincerely desirous than myself of seeing the aims of these undertaking fulfilled. But, Senators, how can anyone criticize at this stage of the game when one asks to be given, in connection with any resettlement project which has heretofore been undertaken, a report of its success, a report of what it costs, a report of its effects on local conditions, a report as to its influence on employment, and any of those elements which it is designed to carry out?

There is another thing concerning which I have not been able to get information—it is very pertinent—and that is whether, in the final analysis, the Federal Government intends to enter the States and become a permanent resident therein, or whether it intends to set up these certain projects and then retire from the States and leave them to some local administration or management.

I do not know that I shall have any success, Mr. President—in fact, I think the handwriting is on the wall indicating that I shall not succeed—but I am going to change my approach to this investigation, and I am going to press my original resolution from time to time. I may also, from time to time, add to the data I have submitted to the Senate today. I have a number of interesting affidavits, a number of interesting items of specific information, which I did not have in shape to present yesterday or today.

I am very much in accord with the request for information contained in the resolution of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. His resolution would have languished in committee, however, had it not been that he undertook to present it in his able and convincing way and force it through. He was given an opportunity to talk about it first, and not afterward. I am glad he was, because he can use the time to splendid advantage.

Mr. President, I take exception to the way my amendment was treated. I do not do it in any personal sense, but I feel that I was not given my day in court, as were other Senators. Yesterday, however, I did not desire to pursue the subject, because, as I have previously said, the feeling in the Senate was getting so tense, as I sensed it, that had I pressed for the adoption of my amendment it might have militated against the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Michigan in connection with A. A. A. payments.

EXTENSION OF VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2883) to provide for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, yesterday unanimous consent was given to consider first the committee amendments to Senate bill 2883.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the committee will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, in section 1, on page 1, line 6, after the word "beginning", to strike out "after the date of the enactment of this act and annually thereafter until June 30, 1941, the sum of $12,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1942, the sum of $11,500,000, and annually thereafter the sum authorized for the previous fiscal year decreased by the sum of $500,000 until the total amount annually authorized is $6,000,000, which latter sum shall be authorized annually thereafter" and to insert in lieu thereof "July 1, 1936, and annually thereafter, the sum of $12,000,000."

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, with reference to the first committee amendment, I now desire to offer an amendment. In lieu of the date "July 1, 1936", in line 2, on page 2, I move to insert "July 1, 1937."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 4, after the word "shall", to strike out "not."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on the same page, line 4, after the word "match", to strike out "more than" and to insert in lieu thereof "by State or local funds or both."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 6, after the word "section", to strike out "prior to July 1, 1940, and not more than 75 percent in each subsequent year" and to insert in lieu thereof "until June 30, 1942, 60 percent for the year ending June 30, 1943, 70 percent for the year ending June 30, 1944, 80 percent for the year ending June 30, 1945, 90 percent for the year ending June 30, 1946, and annually thereafter 100 percent of the appropriations authorized under the provisions of this section."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 19, after the word "year", to insert "50 percent of which shall be matched by State or local funds or both."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 22, after the word "beginning", to strike out "after the date of the enactment of this act" and to insert in lieu thereof "July 1, 1936."

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I offer the same amendment at that point, changing the date "July 1, 1936" to "July 1, 1937", so that the authorization will become effective for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1937.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Section 1, as amended, is as follows:

That for the purpose of providing for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1937, and annually thereafter, the sum of $12,000,000: Provided, That the several States and Territories shall be required to match by State or local funds or both 50 percent of the appropriations authorized under the provisions of this section until June 30, 1942, 60 percent for the year ending June 30, 1943, 70 percent for the year ending June 30, 1944, 80 percent for the year ending June 30, 1945, 90 percent for the year ending June 30, 1946, and annually thereafter 100 percent of the appropriations authorized under the provisions of this section. One-third of this sum each year shall be allotted to the States and Territories in the proportion that their farm population bears to the total farm population of the United States and Territories, according to the United States census last preceding the end of the fiscal year in which any such allotment is made, and shall be used for the salaries and necessary travel expenses of teachers, supervisors, and directors of agricultural subjects in such States and Territories. One-third of the sum appropriated for each fiscal year shall be allotted to the States and Territories in the proportion that their rural population bears to the total rural population of the United States and Territories, according to the United States census last preceding the end of the fiscal year in which any such allotment is to be made, and shall be used for the salaries and travel expenses of teachers, supervisors, and directors of home-economics subjects in such States and Territories. One-third of the sum appropriated for each fiscal year shall be allotted to the States and Territories in the proportion that their nonfarm population bears to the total nonfarm population of the United States and Territories, according to the United States census last preceding the end of the fiscal year in which any such allotment is to be made, and shall be used for the salaries and necessary travel expenses of teachers, supervisors, and directors of trade and industrial subjects, including public and other service occupations, in such States and Territories: Provided further, That the allotment of funds to any State or Territory for each of the three purposes enumerated in this section shall be not less than a minimum of $10,000 for any fiscal year, 50 percent of which shall be matched by State or local funds or both, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1937, and annually thereafter the sum of $175,000, or so much thereof as may be needed, which shall be used for the purpose of providing the minimum allotments to the States and Territories provided for in this section.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 3, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. In addition to the sum authorized to be appropriated by section 1 hereof, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, and required to be matched in the same proportions as such sum, the sum of $1,200,000, to be allotted to the States and Territories in the proportion that their total population bears to the total population of the United States and Territories, according to the United States census last preceding the end of the fiscal year in which any such allotment is made, and shall be used for the salaries and necessary travel expenses of teachers, supervisors, and directors of, and maintenance of teacher training in, distributive occupational subjects in such States and Territories: Provided, however, That the allotment of funds to any State or Territory for the purpose of this section shall be not less than a minimum of $5,000 for any fiscal year after July 1, 1936, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1936, and annually thereafter, the sum of $27,000, or so much thereof as may be needed, which shall be used for the purpose of providing the minimum allotments to the States and Territories provided for in this section.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, to that amendment I desire to offer the same amendment that I offered previously; on page 4, in lines 17 and 19, to change the date in each case from July 1, 1936, to July 1, 1937.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I also desire to offer an amendment, on page 4, line 17, increasing the minimum amount that shall be allowed to any State or Territory from $5,000 to $10,000, and a corresponding amendment, made necessary if that shall be adopted, by increasing the amount in line 20 from $27,000 to $54,000.

I make the statement, Mr. President—the Presiding Officer of the Senate and other Senators are interested in the subject—that these amendments are intended to take care of States where the maximum allotments to the States would probably not equal $10,000. I think it is obvious that neither vocational education nor any particular branch of it of importance can be carried on in any State unless the minimum allotment to the State is $5,000. Most all the States would receive more than that allotment, anyway. In probably two or three, or perhaps six States, at the outside, the allotment would not exceed $10,000. It seems to me to be fair that each of the States with the smaller population should receive at least a minimum of $10,000 a year under this particular amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. May I ask the Senator to give me a definition of the language used in line 13 on page 4, "distributive occupational subjects"? Perhaps I should know just what that means, but I am frank to say I do not.

Mr. GEORGE. Section 2 was not contained in the original bill but was inserted by the committee. In the original Smith-Hughes Vocational Act, passed in 1917, provision was made, among other things, for teaching agricultural and also industrial subjects, primarily designed, of course, to take care of the rural high-school areas of the country. Subsequently vocational education has been made applicable and has been adapted to industrial centers in other States. The distributive agencies and the distributive occupations simply deal with those occupations in civil life that have to do with the distribution or sale of the products of the farm, as well as the articles or goods of industry or manufacture, and the phrase embraces the retail and wholesale distributive agencies both for the individuals and for the cooperative organizations or organizations of larger groups, particularly in the farm areas, rather than mere individuals in the community.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. GEORGE. I inquire if the amendment suggested in line 20 is agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COUZENS. I do not object to having the amendment first agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment, on line 17, to the committee amendment, and the amendment, on line 20, to the committee amendment are agreed to; and, without objection, the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Now does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I was much interested in the question propounded by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] with respect to the meaning of the words "distributive occupational subjects", in lines 13 and 14, page 4. Do I understand correctly that that involves the distribution of stocks and bonds and merchandise?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no; only the products of the farm and goods that are manufactured, the articles of industry.

Mr. COUZENS. Where does the Senator find that language limited to the activities he has mentioned?

Mr. GEORGE. There is no specific language limiting it. I explained to the Senator from Colorado that section 2 was included by the committee in the bill as a committee amendment; but it is intended to apply only to those distributive agencies that have to do with the physical sale or the exchange of the products of the farms and articles of manufacture.

Mr. COUZENS. There is no limitation in the bill to that effect?

Mr. GEORGE. There is no express limitation, I may say to the Senator, unless the whole purpose of the proposed legislation be considered and the organic act itself be considered. I think the organic act, read in connection with this bill, very clearly evidences that purpose and very clearly limits it to distributive agencies or occupations of that character.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In section 3, page 5, line 4, after the word "beginning", it is proposed by the committee to strike out "after the date of the enactment of this act" and insert "July 1, 1936", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of cooperating with the States and Territories in preparing teachers, supervisors, and directors of agricultural, trade and industrial, and home-economics subjects there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the use of the several States and Territories for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1936, and annually thereafter the sum of $1,000,000. Said sum shall be allotted to the several States and Territories in the proportion which their population bears to the total population of the United States and Territories, according to the last preceding United States census: Provided, That the allotment of funds to any State or Territory shall be not less than a minimum of $5,000 for any fiscal year. And there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year beginning after the enactment of the act and annually thereafter the sum of $27,000, or so much thereof as may be needed, which shall be used for the purpose of providing the minimum allotments to the States and Territories provided for in this section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, before that amendment is agreed to, should not the Senator change the date so as to read "July 1, 1937"?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan is correct. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "1936" and inserting "1937."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In section 4, on page 5, line 22, after the word "beginning", it is proposed by the committee to strike out "after the date of the enactment of this act" and insert "July 1, 1936."

Mr. GEORGE. I offer to that amendment the same amendment as in the preceding case, namely, to strike out "1936" and insert "1937."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In section 4, page 5, line 24, after the words "sum of", it is proposed to strike out "$150,000" and insert "$175,000", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Office of Education, Department of the Interior, for vocational education, for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1936, and annually thereafter, the sum of $175,000, to be expended for the same purposes and in the same manner as provided in section 7 of the act approved February 23, 1917, as amended October 6, 1917.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, in section 6, page 7, line 6, after the word "year", to insert "that the provisions of section 11 of the act of February 23, 1917, requiring at least one-third of the sum appropriated to any State to be expended for part-time schools or classes shall be held to include any part-time day-school classes for workers 14 years of age and over, and evening-school classes for workers 16 years of age and over; except that the appropriations made by this act for distributive occupational subjects shall be limited to part-time and evening schools as provided in said act of February 23, 1917, for trade, home economics, and industrial subjects and as qualified by the provisions of this section"; and in line 17, after the word "section", to strike out "3" and insert "4", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. The appropriations made by this act shall be in addition to, and shall be subject to the same conditions and limitations as, the appropriations made by the act entitled "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and in the trades and industries; to provide cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditures", approved February 23, 1917, except that the appropriations made by this act for home economics shall be subject to the conditions and limitations applicable to the appropriation for agricultural purposes under such act of February 23, 1917, with the exception of that part of section 10 thereof which requires directed or supervised practice for at least 6 months per year; that such moneys as are provided by this act for trade and industrial subjects, including public and other service occupations, may be expended for part-time classes operated for less than 144 hours per year; that the provisions of section 11 of the act of February 23, 1917, requiring at least one-third of the sum appropriated to any State to be expended for part-time schools or classes shall be held to include any part-time day-school classes for workers 14 years of age and over, and evening-school classes for workers 16 years of age and over; except that the appropriations made by this act for distributive occupational subjects shall be limited to part-time and evening schools as provided in said act of February 23, 1917, for trade, home economics, and industrial subjects and as qualified by the provisions of this section; and that the appropriations available under section 4 of this act shall be available for expenses of attendance at meetings of educational associations and other organizations and for expenses of conferees called to meet in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, which, in the opinion of the Commissioner, are necessary for the efficient discharge of the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will be authorized to renumber the sections.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I think there is one amendment that must necessarily be made now in order to make the other portions of the bill correspond to the amendments which were made on page 4, in line 17, and in line 20. I therefore move to change the figures "$175,000" in line 24, page 5, to "$350,000."

In connection with that amendment, I will state that it simply doubles the amount which may be paid to the States; otherwise they would receive less than the maximum amounts fixed in the bill. It authorizes the use of only so much as may be necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia is an amendment to a committee amendment already agreed to. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered and the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the committee amendment on page 5, line 24, after the words "sum of", it is proposed to strike out "$175,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$350,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment in line 12, page 5, to strike out the numerals "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000." The amendment is offered for the same reason as stated in connection with the preceding amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I believe that takes care of all the committee amendments except the numerals $10,000 on page 3, in line 19, where, in order to make the bill conform to the other amendments already inserted, the figures should be increased from $10,000 to $20,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, line 12, after the word "of", it is proposed to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$10,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I merely wish to make a brief statement. The purpose of this bill is to place vocational education on a permanent basis; that is, so far as the additional appropriations carried in the bill are concerned. The act of 1917, known as the Smith-Hughes Act, provides for a continuing appropriation, but from time to time since 1917 additional appropriations have been made for limited periods. This bill, if enacted into law, contemplates a continuing appropriation to cover and to increase the appropriations heretofore made for limited periods of time, supplementing the original continuing appropriations made by the act of 1917.

I should like to say, Mr. President, before I take my seat, that in 1935 there were enrolled in federally aided vocational schools 1,178,896 adults and minors above the age of 14. Training in some 300 occupations was afforded to that vast enrollment. I may say also that in 1935, after the period of the depression had been continued to that year, the actual expenditure by the States and Territories for every dollar of Federal funds devoted to vocational education amounted to $2.13; so that the primary objective and the initial hope of those who fostered vocational education in the United States have been realized; that is to say, that the States have expended more than twice the amount contributed by the Federal Government for vocational education in the several States and Territories.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to detain the Senate for more than a few minutes. I am led to submit a few observations only because of communications which I have received, in favor of the National Government assuming control over the public-school systems of the States, or of granting large annual subsidies to the States for educational purposes.

I have been requested to support a plan for a Federal Department of Education. During the period of the depression through which we have passed some of the States and their political subdivisions have been compelled to reduce their expenditures, including appropriations for public schools. This has resulted in requests being made for appropriations from the Federal Treasury to aid the States in carrying out the duties and responsibilities which belong to them.

I think it must be admitted that the power and authority of the Federal Government has been increased, and this increase has been at the expense of the rights of sovereign States, and the authority and rights of local communities as well as of individuals. It is obvious that if the power of the Federal Government is increased, it will be at the expense of the authority and rights of sovereign States and their political subdivisions, as well as of the citizens therein. I think all Senators will admit that there has been a constantly increasing centripetal movement which has operated against individuals and States, in favor of the National Government. This has resulted, as I have indicated, in increasing the power of the Federal Government and the weakening of the authority of the States. That fine equilibrium, that balance of authority between sovereign States and the Federal Government contemplated by the fathers, and provided for in the Constitution of the United States, has been disturbed. The assumption by the National Government of the duty and responsibility resting upon the States, even if challenged in the beginning as a violation of the Constitution and the impairment of the rights of States and of individuals will, if long continued, create a situation and develop a psychology that will make it difficult, indeed if not impossible, to restore the equilibrium between the Federal Govenment and the States which formerly prevailed.

When power is once exercised by a government, particularly if it is obtained by usurpation or by the indifference and apathy of the people, it is seldom relinquished. Gravitational forces operate in governments as well as in the universe. The founders of the Republic, having the lessons of history before them, and knowing the propensity of governments to magnify their authority, were determined to fix barriers beyond which the National Government could not go, and to provide protection to individuals in the States and their inhabitants so that local self-government might be enjoyed and individual rights preserved.

I appreciate that appeals to maintain the rights of the States and to restrict the Federal Government to the paths in which, under the Constitution it should walk, will not by many be regarded with favor. Measures increasing Federal authority and creating new organizations and bureaus, meet with more or less approval. The landmarks set up by the fathers are not always observed. The chief concern of Jefferson and those who gave us the Constitution, was to protect the rights of individuals.

We hear much about property rights. It is important to have liberty and personal rights and justice and law and order. Individual and personal rights are usually the first to be attacked, when governments reach out for additional authority. The loss of liberty, when it has been gained, does not occur overnight. It results from insidious advances, often when the people are unaware or indifferent or complacent. Thomas Jefferson and the founders of the Democratic Party, and indeed those who laid the foundations of the Republic, were deeply concerned with the problem of education. They believed that educational processes would largely determine economic and political policy. They were essentially interested in individual growth and development, and in the domestic affairs and the maintenance of vigorous and dynamic States. They believed that one of the primary responsibilities resting upon the States was that of education; they believed in the public schools, democratic in character, and operated and controlled by local communities and the States.

As I have indicated, they feared an aggressive, grasping, and all-pervading National Government. They understood that one of the weapons used by strongly centralized governments to bring the masses of the people under its control, and to accept its philosophy, was to control the fountains of education, the springs of intellectual progress, the press, and the liberalizing forces that make for a progressive civilization. They believed that democratic institutions could only survive where there was freedom and liberty and a high standard of education. They were therefore vitally interested in a democratic public-school system, controlled by local communities and the States, and free from the authority of the National Government and the temptations that would arise to secure benefits and gratuities from the latter to be followed, as would be inevitable, by the extension of Federal authority and the diffusion of the philosophy that strongly national government, in counter-distinction to local self-government, is advantageous and important.

Accordingly, under the philosophy of Jefferson and others, one of the most important duties of the States was to provide a public-school system, democratic in character and free from external influences or Federal control. They believed that democratic institutions with freedom and liberty inherent therein could only be maintained where there was an enlightened public, where education was free, and where opportunity for individual development and growth was secure. Jefferson emphasized this philosophy in his own State of Virginia, and sought the establishment of a free public-school system, beginning with the primary and culminating in a great university. As Senators will recall, when preparing the words to be engraved upon his tombstone, he did not speak of the fact that he had been Governor or President, or had served his country abroad; he spoke of the Declaration of Independence, the standard for religious liberty, and the fact that he was the founder of the University of Virginia.

Jefferson was not only the great apostle of liberty, of justice, but he laid the foundation of a broad and liberal educational system and sought to promote the highest form of cultural and intellectual development. Liberty with him was a religion, and it was his passion to inaugurate and see carried into effect, plans and policies that would develop the highest type of intellectual and cultural greatness. He was a profound student of the Scriptures, and accepted the doctrine of the Founder of Christianity, that salvation, temporal and spiritual, must result from individual growth and development. He was opposed to powerful organizations of every sort or character that would seek to control by force or improper methods the thoughts and lives of the people or compress them into a standardized form, whether lifeless or aggressively dynamic. Believing in liberty with all its connotations, he sought the establishment of a public-school system controlled by the States and beyond the authority of the Federal Government.

I have indicated that the Federal Government is extending its authority into fields reserved to the States and individuals and local communities. Undoubtedly there is a growing disposition manifested in various parts of the United States to have the Federal Government intrude into the field of education. Perhaps those who are seeking Federal intrusion into the field of education are content, for the moment, with obtaining Federal contributions. However, upon mature thought, they must reach the conclusion that if it becomes a policy of the National Government to expend money for educational purposes within the States, it will be inevitable that such expenditures will ultimately be accompanied by rules and regulations and demands that the Federal Government shall influence, if not control, the curricula, determine the character of the teachers employed, and generally prescribe the objectives to be sought.

History is replete with examples of the augmented authority central governments assert when they once transgress the limitations prescribed for them. The preservation of the States and the rights of individual liberty are problems which even this Republic must meet. There must be no compounding of the States, no standardization of life, no such unification as results from an educational system directed or controlled by the National Government.

Mr. President, what is desired is education and more education, liberty and more liberty, freedom of expression, freedom of thought, freedom of religion, and freedom to walk the paths of life unmolested and unafraid. This great Republic, founded by men who fought for liberty and justice, priceless and immeasurable in its wealth and glory, must be preserved.

Mr. President, the observations which I have made are not aimed at the bill before us. A number of years ago Congress enacted a law, of which the bill before us is a part, under which a limited sum was advanced for vocational education. The measure before us is in harmony with that bill and seeks only to increase the annual appropriation heretofore made and to give a permanency to the policy which, as stated, has heretofore been adopted. I am somewhat apprehensive that this measure, which has great merit, may later on be regarded as a precedent for the intrusion upon the part of the Federal Government into the educational systems of the States. It may be that efforts will be made to secure large Federal contributions for expenditure in every educational field. It would be most unfortunate if demands were made upon the Federal Government to control our schools and direct our education, and this measure pointed to as a precedent and justification for such action. It is to be hoped that such will not be the case.

As I have stated, the bill before us has meritorious features; that provision should be made for proper instructions in agriculture, I think, will be conceded by all; and the States perhaps should do more than they are now doing in this field of education. But this measure must not and should not be used as a basis or pretext for national control of our educational systems or for its intrusion into the public-school systems of the States.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the able Senator from Utah let me, for information, ask his opinion? First, let me say that he will recall that on this floor I was one of the first defenders, opening a demand for money from the Federal Government to pay the teachers of the city of Chicago who were then greatly in distress. The city of Chicago had no funds with which to pay them. I will ask my able friend, knowing he is a great advocate of what we may call the sovereign States, how he would afford the education of these people where there is no money in the State upon which taxes could lay a hand and where there is none with which to pay for schools or education?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in taking this position the Senator must assume that the people of his State are incompetent to govern themselves and to manage their own affairs. Illinois is a rich State—one of the pillars of the Republic. It has large cities, among them Chicago, important manufacturing institutions, and one of the richest and most prosperous agricultural sections in the United States, if not in the entire world. The value of its property, real and personal, amounts to many billions of dollars. My recollection is that not more than two or three States in the Union pay more taxes to the Federal Government than does Illinois. In my opinion, the people of that great State have the capacity and the ability and the financial resources to handle their own affairs and to deal with all problems that come to them. If Illinois, with its wealth and power, cannot maintain its schools, how can it be expected that the Federal Government has resources for that purpose? The Federal Government must tax the people in order to obtain funds for its operations. The Federal Government is compelled to reach its hands into the pockets of the people of Illinois in order to obtain funds for national expenses. If the States were bankrupt, the Federal Government's revenues would cease, and it would be unable to meet its own expenses unless it had credit; and if the bankruptcy of the States continued, obviously the credit of the Government would not only be impaired but probably destroyed. If the Federal Government were required to advance money and maintain the public schools of Illinois, it would be required to increase the taxes, a portion of which the people of Illinois would be required to pay. The Government, in that event, would send its tax gatherers to Illinois to take money from the pockets of the people and transfer the same to the Federal Treasury, and then through its machinery and bureaucratic agencies return it to Illinois and then expend it.

It has been estimated that it costs perhaps from 10 to 15 percent of the moneys collected by the Federal Government to impose the taxes, collect them from the people, and then distribute the same back to the people through the various agencies and bureaus employed in the process. It would mean, therefore, that the people of Illinois would be required ultimately to pay all that the Federal Government advanced to them, plus the incidental and inevitable costs incurred in the various transactions incident thereto.

Mr. President, I repeat when I say that I would rather trust the good people of Illinois—or of any other State, for that matter—to govern themselves and to handle their internal and domestic affairs than to subject them to the control of the Federal Government. Illinois and all the other States that were formed after the Constitution was adopted were Territories. Their inhabitants in due season believed that they were competent to govern themselves, and to manage their own affairs, and they therefore sought admission into the Union as sovereign States. Their appeals were granted and the crown of statehood was placed upon them. It seems to me they may not be heard now to renounce the positions which they occupy and abdicate the sovereignty with which they have been clothed.

As the Senator knows, the Federal Government, notwithstanding the enormous taxes which it has imposed upon the people, has enormous deficits, and its expenditures for this fiscal year will add several billions of dollars to the columns of deficits. It were better for the welfare of the people of the United States to support their States in all their vigor and power and discharge all the obligations resting upon them as sovereign States.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, at this point, seeking guidance from my able friend and knowing how sincere he is, I put this question to him:

Is there such a thing as a citizen of a State obtaining education? Is it not true that he is a citizen of the United States as much as he is a citizen of a State?

Therefore, is it not appropriate from the point of view of my able friend that the citizen, though a citizen of a State in his existence, being also a citizen of the United States, should have education, support, and aid from his whole Government, to which he must give his life at any time of call?

Mr. KING. If a State will not provide education commensurate with the responsibilities that devolve upon its inhabitants and will not discharge the duties and responsibilities resting upon it as a member of the Federal Union, then its right to be a sovereign State might be questioned.

Mr. President, while it is true we are citizens of sovereign States, we are citizens of the United States, but because we are citizens of the United States does not confer upon the National Government unlimited authority and control over us, nor does citizenship of the United States rob us of our citizenship in the States in which we live or absolve us of our duties and obligations to the States nor the duties and obligations of the State to us as individuals. One of the most important duties of the State is to provide a public-school system. That is not and cannot be the function or responsibility of the Federal Government. I cannot concede that anyone will assume that the public-school system of any State will ignore the dual form of government under which we live and fail to take cognizance of the fact that as citizens of the States we all owe allegiance to the United States. No public-school system will be so one-sided, narrow, or provincial that it will perceive no relationship between the Federal Government and the States.

I am sure that the schools of Chicago and Illinois and the teachers therein will not advocate views or expound policies that will not fit their charges for the high duties of citizenship, State and National, and for the responsibility, State and National, which will come to them in life. I repeat when I say that upon the States rests the duty to provide, establish, and maintain a public school and a proper system of education.

History furnishes examples of governments which sought to strengthen their authority over provinces, states, or local political subdivisions and to concentrate political power in the hands of a central government. Rulers have not infrequently sought to accomplish that end by gaining control over the sources of information and education. We are told that Bismarck, when he sought to strengthen the German Empire, endeavored to obtain control over the schools of the various German States. Subsidies were paid to them, the compensation of teachers was increased by the central government, and little by little the teachers, and, of course, the pupils, were brought under the influence of a powerful central government, which was inculcating the view among the people that there must be a powerful German Empire, imperial and imperialistic, military and militaristic. The result was that when the World War burst upon the world the German teachers and professors and the boys and girls who had been educated in the public schools and in the universities were amenable to the teachings which they had received and their thoughts in life were largely determined by the imperialistic policies which had been expounded to them under the influence of Bismarck and the Central Government.

Mr. President, having occupied more time than I intended when I arose, I surrender the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate does not initiate a new movement. It does not provide that the Federal Government shall assume a responsibility relating to education which it has not heretofore assumed.

In 1917, realizing that the subject matters of vocational education were affected with national concern, the Congress passed a bill which met the approval of the Executive; and during the nearly 20 years that have elapsed since that time we have been making appropriations, to be spent in conjunction with similar funds appropriated by the respective States, for the purpose of providing vocational education. Substantially the same thing has been done with regard to the construction of highways.

While this bill does contemplate an increase in the amount which the Federal Government shall contribute to the subject, it also contemplates an enlargement of programs, which enlargement has been made necessary by experience in the administration of the existing law.

If I thought for one moment that the dire consequences depicted by the able Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] would result from the passage of this measure, I should, of course, refuse to support it; but, sincerely, I do not believe that any real question of the permanence of American institutions, or of the preservation of democratic institutions, is involved in the proposed legislation.

This is rather a critical time for those who are young, and who are becoming the responsible citizens of this great Government. Thousands of them are passing out of colleges, universities, and high schools who have no fitness for any occupation or profession in which there is an opening for them, or in which, even by great sacrifice, they may secure employment.

Because of those circumstances there is in this country a resource of great value to the present and to future generations that is in danger of being wasted—a resource for which there can be no substitute. I refer to the young manhood of the Nation. It is not wrong—it is right, in my judgment, from every standpoint—to combine the efforts and the activities of the Federal Government with those of the local political organizations, the States and their subdivisions, in an effort to extend this wholesome service to the communities which now are denied it. Because to do so will conserve the Nation's wealth in its young men and women.

If Senators will analyze the figures which are, no doubt, in the possession of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], they will find that while the system in existence has operated effectively and economically, there are still large areas which have not been reached because the combined funds of the Federal and the State Governments are insufficient to make the necessary provision; and it is admittedly true that when this measure shall have gone into effect that condition in a lessened degree may still exist in a number of the Commonwealths composing the Union. This movement, however, is wholesome, it is helpful, at a time when it is worse needed than when it was created.

The argument of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] implies that instead of expanding the efforts to promote vocational education, so far as the Federal Government is concerned, we should entirely withdraw from that field. I do not believe that such a suggestion will strike a responsive chord in many breasts. Assuming that the service is valuable and helpful, giving encouragement and hope and usefulness and opportunity to those who are soon to become primary factors in control of both the social and political affairs of the Nation, this is the time to increase the effort rather than to diminish it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, before a vote is taken on the pending bill, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a statement with reference to the part of the bill which makes provision for training in distributive occupations for the purpose of assuring the able Senator from Michigan

[Mr. COUZENS], who is now absent from the floor, that his apprehensions are not well founded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

DISTRIBUTIVE OCCUPATIONS

1. Less than 500 small store operators out of 1,700,000 retailers in this country are being shown how to meet competition from chain and other large selling organizations.

2. Only one State now—Wisconsin—is offering classes to help small retailers and shopowners manage better.

3. Two hundred and fifty thousand or more beginners are employed in stores each year without any preparation for this kind of work.

4. Less than 2,500 beginners are trained in high schools each year for store employments.

5. Few courses in selling farm products to consumers are now being given.

6. Less than 300 high schools out of 26,000 high schools offer courses preparing youth for store service occupations.

7. Apprenticeship for boys preparing for retail store management necessary for reducing cost of distributing products of farms and factories.

8. Classes for helping farmers and other producers sell their products to consumers will help farmers to market their products to better advantage.

9. Classes for training men in managing cooperative marketing organizations are necessary for further development of cooperative marketing.

10. Vocational education for retailers and other distributors is necessary for reducing cost of distribution to consumers and also producers.

11. Only when efficiency of distributors is equal to efficiency of primary producers will there be a better balance between production and consumption.

12. The economic distribution of the products of agriculture and of industry depends upon increased efficiency of retailers and wholesalers. Vocational education for distributors is as necessary as for primary producers.

13. Vocational education for distributors and other middlemen will aid producing industries and also consumers.

Mr. GEORGE. I also ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a statement showing the present field occupied by agricultural education, and the additional needs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION

Demand for vocational agriculture during emergency greatly increased; 600 new departments started during present school year due to permanent character of instruction; demands will continue to increase.

Although 5,700 localities are now reached by vocational agriculture, 15,000 rural communities need to be reached. With sufficient Federal funds an additional 1,000 rural centers on a matched basis or 3,000 additional rural centers with unmatched funds could have been established.

Twenty-three thousand out-of-school farm boys received part-time instruction in vocational agriculture in 1934–35, a total of 3,000,000 out-of-school farm youth in the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Also, Mr. President, I should like to have inserted in the RECORD a letter typical of letters received of all of the farm leaders of the United States, without an exception. This particular letter is addressed to the President of the United States by L. J. Taber, master of the National Grange. I merely ask to have it inserted because it illustrates the attitude of all the farm organizations in the United States on this question.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 29, 1936.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Allow me to call your attention to the valuable service that vocational education has rendered, not only during the emergency but ever since the passage of this legislation years ago. There is pending in the Senate the George bill which continues this service and makes additional appropriations available now when it is so badly needed.

In my travels from one end of the Nation to the other I have found in practically every State in the Union requests for increased vocational, educational assistance. There is an opportunity to establish many new schools or departments in every State in the Union.

I believe that no expenditure of Federal funds can bring over the years larger dividends in happiness and human welfare than money spent in vocational education, club work, and similar activity that enables boys and girls to live more useful and happier lives.

I am confident that there is no legislation pending in Congress with more unqualified endorsement of the Grange and all its members than legislation expanding the usefulness of vocational education.

Yours very truly,

L. J. TABER,
Master, National Grange.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, without going more into detail or discussing the subject longer, I offer for the RECORD a statement dealing with the pending bill specifically, paragraph by paragraph, as well as the general subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. The 1935 enrollments in Federally aided vocational schools represented training for 300 occupations and included:

		Percent
109,970	adult farmers, in evening schools, training to improve their methods	9.3
215,715	farm youths over 14, in rural high schools, in training for full-fledged farmers	18.3
154,352	wage-earning adults, in evening schools, training to improve themselves in their jobs	13.1
131,580	youths over 14, in full-time trade schools or classes, training to enter the skilled trades	11.2
217,933	wage-earning youths over 14, in part-time schools, learning while they earn a living	18.5
134,391	rural and urban adult women in training to improve their homemaking methods	11.4
176,321	rural and urban girls, in high schools, training for home making	14.9
38,634	wage-earning girls over 14, in part-time classes, training for homemaking	3.3
1,178,896		100.0

2. That the present Federal cooperation with the States under the Smith-Hughes Act and George-Ellzey Act stimulates the States to promote vocational training is shown by the fact that every State promptly accepted the provisions of the act; with few exceptions the States and local communities use practically all Federal funds allotted, and now after 6 years of depression they spend for the same purpose $2.13 of State and local money to every dollar of Federal aid.

3. Greatly increased funds for agricultural education are needed to provide the present and future farmer with the training necessary to bring about the diversified and balanced commercial and subsistence agriculture for which our Nation is so tremendously striving.

4. Greatly increased Federal cooperation with the States in training for trade and industrial, wage earning, public and private service occupations is needed to further stimulate and aid the States in solving the pressing and momentous training problems incident to:

a. The continuous vocational retraining of wage earners, unemployed, unsteadily employed, or likely to be, because of increasing mechanization, progress in business, and industrial efficiency, and changing economic demands, into operators of the newer machines and processes, or into new and expanding occupations, as similar as possible to the occupations in which they are experienced.

b. The continuous vocational improvements of wage earners, unemployed, unsteadily employed, or likely to be, because of their lack of the hand and technical efficiency increasingly demanded of the occupations in which they are attempting to earn their livelihoods.

c. The vocational training of older tradesmen into the lighter and more skilled branches of their respective trades in which their past experiences will be continuing assets and declining strength will be no bar.

d. The discovery and vocational retraining of permanently displaced former employees of mass-production industry who possess the required talent into the individual production and sale of hand-craft articles.

e. The training of the Nation's increasing number of apprentices in the skilled trades and learners in other occupations to a high degree of all-around hand and technical efficiency in their chosen occupations as insurance against future unemployment and loss of wages and as assurance of an adequate supply of thoroughly skilled workers for the Nation.

5. Additional Federal funds are needed for the training of the people displaced by the increasing efficiency of, and demanded in, agriculture and industry into employment in the distributive occupations in order to move more efficiently to the consumer the product of such increasing efficiency. The need for efficient training for distributive occupations is reflected in the relatively tremendous increase in youths and adults engaged in distributive occupations as compared with productive occupations. This need is reflected by the increase of 17.3 percent in all gainfully employed persons in the country, the 1.9-percent decrease in those employed in agriculture, the 16.3-percent increase in those employed in manufacturing, and the 42.8-percent increase in those employed in distribution.

6. Paralleling the increasing need for agricultural education and trade and industrial education for farmers and wage-earning men and their sons is the correspondingly, tremendously increasing need of training the farmers' and wage earners' wives and daughters to a balanced production, intelligent consumption, and conservation in the life of the home.

7. Additional Federal aid for vocational education is needed to furnish a sound and constructive outlet for the rapidly developing Nation-wide interest of educators, parents, and youths in the problem of training of our youths for the lives which they must live.

8. While agriculture and employment are now doubtless on the upgrade and will thereby, with the foregoing needs, make greatly increasing demands upon vocational education in the next few years, the ravages of the depression will continue to be felt for several years in State and local community financing of education, thus indicating the necessity of a substantial portion of the increased Federal funds for vocational education not being required for several years to be matched by State or local funds.

9. Additional funds are needed, and needed badly, by both the United States Office of Education and by the States, and jointly, for training of vocational teachers, prospective and already in service, including the stimulation of research and the collecting of research data vital to the efficient functioning of vocational education.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the problems of long-time planning for American youth and the aged are not new to us. They have challenged our attention for years, but never more insistently than today. The necessity for meeting them in a practical way rises far above the clamor of party rivalries. The issue of vocational education now before the Senate is in no way a partisan one, but calls for the best thought of us all. During the decade while I was Secretary of Labor I served as chairman of the Federal Board for Vocational Education and I had an excellent opportunity to observe the benefits which have come to the youth of our Nation through Federal aid to education. I consider the expenditure of money for education as one of the best of investments, and this was never more true than now in view of unemployment difficulties.

Many States and most rural communities are unable to finance the needed expansion of vocational programs for the farmer, industrial workers, and unemployed youth. The appropriation now under consideration will help the States and local communities to meet the present emergent situation and will provide also for the permanent needs of our cooperative vocational program.

Mr. President, if the depression has taught us anything in the field of education, it has shown that education must be related more practically to the economic needs of individuals. Through practical experience and first-hand supervisory knowledge of trade education, I have long been convinced that the great majority of our youth need an educational chance to develop skill and trade techniques. Probably we all know of specific institutions where these great advantages are now available to both youth and adults alike. However, a survey of the national situation and visitation in the several States will demonstrate an appalling dearth of practical educational opportunity for great numbers of the underprivileged masses of our citizens. It is for them and their children that I would bespeak these blessings. Living as we do in a time when we have appropriated and are spending billions to maintain the physical well-being of our people, we cannot afford to refuse an appropriation of a few million dollars for their permanent educational and vocational needs. In the final analysis we shall doubtless find that the solution of our unemployment problem is closely related to a proper distribution of our youth in the various fields of labor. Vocational education is a step in that direction.

I wish to read excerpts from the declaration of rights of American youth, which was adopted by the Second American Youth Congress at Detroit on July 4, 1935, by delegates of 853 organizations representing 1,350,000 American youth:

We declare that our generation is rightfully entitled to a useful, creative, and happy life, the guaranties of which are full educational opportunities, steady employment at adequate wages, security in time of need, civil rights, and peace.

We are determined to realize in actuality the ideals of a free America. We demand not only the maintenance but the extension of our elementary rights of free speech, press, and assemblage. We oppose company unions and affirm the right of workers to join labor unions of their own choosing in order to advance their economic interests. We consider full academic freedom essential to progress and enlightenment. We strongly oppose fascism, with its accompanying demagogy, as a complete negation of our right to liberty.

Our right to work includes the right of proper preparation for work. Education must be available to everyone without discrimination, poor as well as rich, Negroes as well as white, through free scholarships and Government aid to needy students. Our educational system should provide for vocational training at adequate wages under trade-union supervision.

I have quoted only portions of this declaration, selecting those parts which relate most closely to the topic of vocation education, which we have under consideration. This is the voice of youth, and youth has a right to be heard.

The task before us is so great that it outruns the imagination of those who have never seriously considered it. It is estimated that from 5,000,000 to 8,000,000 young people between the ages of 16 and 25 are wholly unoccupied. They are neither working nor attending school. Almost 3,000,000 young people are on relief. Seven hundred thousand young people had to quit school last year before they had finished high school. Last June hundreds of thousands of them graduated from school and college into a labor market which offered them no work. This situation is loaded with dynamite. It holds a triple threat in its challenge to our democratic institutions, American wage standards, and Christian morality. It requires but little imagination to see that if we do not do something with our young people we may be sure that they will do something with us. Were we to return to the standards of 1929, as many as 20 percent of the employable unemployed would still remain idle. Mr. Isadore Lubin, Commissioner of Labor Statistics, has shown that if we should return to 1929 conditions there would still be four and one-half million people unemployed, and the majority of these would be young people.

The United States Office of Education estimates that there are 2,000,000 young people in this country who need financial aid in order to continue their education. I believe this to be a very conservative estimate.

The problems of proper care for our youth and provision for our aged are today joined together. These problems unite in the unsolved problem of unemployment. Practical plans must be developed whereby youth may enter the labor market later and retirement may be provided for the aged. I have been talking about this problem for over a quarter of a century. Now the time has come when we must actually do something about it, or we shall feel the heavy hand of compulsion resting upon us. One of these days I dare say we will see organized youth and the organized aged bring their forces together into a solid phalanx of public opinion. When that occurs we shall all be ready to take constructive action on this very important problem. What we do for youth and age will not then be something incidental to our legislative program, but will be at the very center of our best progressive thinking.

Mr. President, if I know the young people of America, as I believe I do, they desire an opportunity to grapple with the great social, economic, and political problems of our day. Many are now bitter and disillusioned. They do not ask for charity. They want work and the necessary preparation for work. If we seek to deny them what is rightly theirs, we may well expect that our places will be taken by those who will meet their practical needs. Here is our land with untold riches, industries, and factories, geared and mechanized to the point where everyone could live in decency and comfort and lack for nothing; its farms capable of producing enough food and cotton to feed and clothe its citizens and a goodly portion of the rest of the world; a transportation system spanning the country from sea to sea; an inventive genius which is the marvel of the world; laboratories and research departments probing the depths of the earth and the mysteries of the skies, and yet, with it all, millions are on relief, unclothed and improperly fed, barely existing on a dole, and under our present program with no future ahead. Why is this? Long ago the answer was given. Where there is no vision the people perish. And the elected representatives of the people are responsible for the appalling situation which confronts us today. We have just as many unemployed in 1936 as we had in 1932.

The bill before the Senate today authorizes an appropriation of $12,000,000. It will be $12,000,000 well spent, but it will not be enough. When we really begin to see the problems before us, we shall see that this is not enough. Where are the young people of our cities today? Where are our boys and girls 16 and 17 years of age? No longer are they in school. No longer are they in the shops and factories. Social workers tell us, as did Mr. Phil Schiff, head worker of Madison House, New York:

From my own experience in neighborhood work, I have seen houses of prostitution open in greater number than ever before. I have had to enlist the aid of the New York City police department in closing up the most flagrant ones. I have seen my young people, 16 and 17 years of age, dilly-dallying around in these places, with a resultant increase in venereal diseases. We have had to embark on a campaign of education, not to stop these young people so much from entering these brothels, as to tell them what to do after contracting gonorrhea or syphilis.

Self-respect and moral regard for the opposite sex are greatly on the decline. The churches of America can preach day in and day out on the subject of "love of God and your neighbor", but unless we dedicate ourselves to the task of providing youth with jobs and proper schooling, thus making possible a wholesome outlet for their leisure time, just so long will we suffer from the pangs of a declining morality.

Listen to this description of life in a mining town by a woman who is a daughter of a West Virginia coal miner. She says: "I was forced to quit school because my books cost me $15 and because I could not buy clothes, shoes, and lunches. I knew of no one I could work for because most of the other families were about as badly off as we were. One of my friends' family was also on direct relief. They live in a one-room shack with no sanitary conditions. There are two windows. There is no sewer. Dishwater stands in the yard. The outside toilet breeds flies. The house has no screens.

"Life in a mining town is different from other places. The homes are all of one dull color. Outside toilets sometimes drain into the well that everyone uses. Coal and wood fires are used for heat. Children are everywhere. There is no privacy indoors. Usually three people sleep in a bed. Families eat the cheapest kind of food. Usually a meal consists of one dish. In winter it is dried beans. Green vegetables are too expensive, except during the summer, when the family may have a garden.

"Mining towns have almost no social activities, and the result is that young people turn to sex, forcing them into marriage much too young, before they really have seen anything of life. If these children were properly educated and had jobs, they would not have to turn to sex to amuse themselves. Many of them are very intelligent and do want to get away from it all. But do they have a chance? What is their future?"

Mr. President, I ask with this young woman, What is the future of the youth of this land if we do not provide work opportunities for them and adequate, practical, educational preparation for the work to be done? The pending proposed legislation is a step in the right direction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10489) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding and settlement of the city of New Rochelle, N. Y., which were, on page 1, line 12, of the Senate engrossed amendment, to strike out "1936" and insert "1938"; and on page 2, line 1, of the Senate engrossed amendment, to strike out "five" and insert "twenty-five."

Mr. ADAMS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

DEPORTATION OF ALIEN CRIMINALS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2969) to authorize the deportation of criminals, to guard against the separation from their families of aliens of the noncriminal classes, to provide for legalizing the residence in the United States of certain classes of aliens, and for other purposes.

PROHIBITION OF PRICE DISCRIMINATIONS

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I had hoped that the Senate might be able to proceed to a conclusion with the pending bill. The Senators in charge of the measure inform me, however, that some of those most interested are necessarily and unavoidably absent from the Senate, that efforts to produce an agreement are in progress, and that the efforts are likely to succeed. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3154, commonly known as the fair-price bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas has asked unanimous consent temporarily to lay aside the unfinished business, and that raises an important question, inasmuch as the request is followed by a request that the Senate proceed to the consideration of an entirely different measure. For that reason I should like to have a larger attendance, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Chavez	King	Reynolds
Ashurst	Connally	La Follette	Robinson
Austin	Coolidge	Lewis	Russell
Bachman	Copeland	Logan	Schwellenbach
Bailey	Couzens	Lonergan	Sheppard
Barbour	Davis	Long	Shipstead
Barkley	Dieterich	McAdoo	Smith
Benson	Donahey	McKellar	Steiwer
Bilbo	Duffy	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Black	Fletcher	Maloney	Thomas, Utah
Bone	Frazier	Metcalf	Townsend
Borah	George	Minton	Truman
Brown	Gerry	Murphy	Tydings
Bulkley	Gibson	Murray	Vandenberg
Bulow	Glass	Neely	Van Nuys
Burke	Hale	Norris	Wagner
Byrd	Harrison	Nye	Walsh
Byrnes	Hatch	O'Mahoney	Wheeler
Capper	Hayden	Overton	White
Caraway	Johnson	Pittman
Carey	Keyes	Radcliffe

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the request should be restated, inasmuch as there are now some Senators present who were absent when the matter was first proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas has asked unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3154, making it unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to discriminate in price or terms of sale between purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, to prohibit the payment of brokerage or commission under certain conditions, to suppress pseudo-advertising allowances, to provide a presumptive measure of damages in certain cases, and to protect the independent merchant, the public whom he serves, and the manufacturer from whom he buys, from exploitation by unfair competitors. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, a number of Senators have entered the Chamber since I first submitted the request, and I should now like to explain that Senators who are in charge of and most vitally interested in the unfinished business have announced that they are not ready to proceed. Some of those most concerned are absent from the city. I am, therefore, making a request that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the so-called price-discrimination bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred a bill of a similar character, was remodeled, after the appointment of the committee, so as to include the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], who reported the Robinson-Patman bill, and the Senator from New Mexico withdrew from the chairmanship of the subcommittee when the Senator from Kentucky came on the subcommittee. Thereupon hearings were held which included testimony relating to the Robinson-Patman bill. The testimony is rather voluminous, and it has taken longer than was expected to print it. Information which came to me on inquiry this morning, when I learned that there was a possibility of the bill referred to by the Senator from Arkansas being brought forward, indicates that the proof of the hearings has been read and sent back to the Printer, and that there probably remains nothing more to be done except to sew up the books and get them into our hands by tomorrow. It is the estimate of the Printing Office that we may have the testimony by tomorrow.

Of course, the mere possession of the books would not do Senators any good if they did not have an opportunity to read the testimony, and there would be no opportunity to do so between now and tomorrow. Therefore, I submit this interrogatory to the Senator from Arkansas, whether he does not think that under the circumstances it would be beneficial not to bring the measure on for consideration for 2 or 3 days?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Vermont when the hearings on the Borah-Van Nuys bill were closed by the subcommittee?

Mr. AUSTIN. I cannot recall instantly the date when the hearings were concluded.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Vermont that the hearings were closed some time ago, but some of those who participated in hearings did not get their testimony corrected in time for the hearings to be promptly printed. They will be printed in a few days.

There is nothing new in the hearings, but let me say to the Senator that my thought is that the House committee, after many months of hearings, have reported a bill radically different from the bill reported to the Senate. If we wait much longer, we will get behind the tax bill, and those who favor legislation along this line will perhaps be disappointed in their desire to have any bill passed.

My suggestion is that we proceed to the consideration of the bill, well realizing that the House will pass its own bill, or a different bill from that passed by the Senate. Then we will hold our hearings on the Borah-Van Nuys bill, and we hope that we may get something worked out which can be agreed upon before a conference committee. That is what I had in mind. Otherwise, we will have no legislation at all. It will be absolutely necessary for a conference committee to work out the provisions of a bill satisfactory to those who favor the proposed legislation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I only wish to say that I am rather in harmony with the views expressed by the able Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. It seems to me that in all probability this measure will have to be worked out in conference, and I should like to suggest to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Kentucky both, the advisability of giving consideration to the Borah-Van Nuys bill as an amendment to the present bill, so that all these measures will be before the conference when it goes to work out the measure.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Idaho, through the courtesy of the Senator having the floor, whether there would be any inconsistency in adopting the Borah-Van Nuys bill as an amendment to the bill under discussion?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think so. When we introduced the Borah-Van Nuys bill we did not introduce it with a view of embarrasing the consideration of the Robinson bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to interrupt, let me say that, as indicated by the remarks of the Senator from Vermont, I am very anxious to have a meeting of the subcommittee, so that we may consider all these bills, and give our best thought to working out something which will be satisfactory. By the time we shall have done that, perhaps the opportunity to consider the matter at all will be gone. However, we can consider the bills and report to the Senate, and have all the information available for the conferees when they meet to consider this bill. That is one reason why I think it is of the utmost importance that we proceed with the consideration of this bill at the present time.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me so I may make a statement?

Mr. AUSTIN. Reserving the right to object later, I take my seat and yield the floor to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to say that it was my desire to secure, if practical, the adoption of the Borah-Van Nuys bill as an amendment to the Robinson bill so that we may have the entire subject matter in conference, because there is where it will ultimately go. In my judgment, the measure which will really pass ultimately will be the measure which the conference works out. I myself do not think there is any inconsistency between the bill which the Senator from Arkansas sponsors and the bill of which I am coauthor. I think the principle embodied in the Borah-Van Nuys bill ought to be incorporated in this legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Idaho that I do not think it would be possible now, under the present situation in the Senate, to determine the question he has raised. The suggestion is well worthy of consideration. The Senator from Kentucky is well and fully advised with reference to this subject matter, and I recognize the fact that he is much better informed concerning it than I myself.

The bill was introduced June 26, 1935, nearly a year ago. Similar subjects matter of legislation were under consideration in the House of Representatives. Prolonged hearings were had not only by the House committee having jurisdiction of a bill similar to the one now under consideration but also by a special committee of the House of Representatives making inquiry into the proceedings of the retail trade associations. There was also available the information supplied by the Federal Trade Commission as a result of careful and complete investigations made by that body into alleged abuses of fair practices which have relationship to the terms of this bill.

The Senate subcommittee had the Robinson bill under consideration for several months, finally reported it to the full committee, and that committee reported favorably on the bill, although there were two Senators who reserved the right to take any attitude they thought proper when the bill should come before the Senate.

The report was made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], who was chairman of both subcommittees—chairman of the subcommittee considering Senate bill 3154 and also chairman of the subcommittee considering the Borah-Van Nuys bill. The chairman of the subcommittee was authorized by the full committee to make a report, and he did report to this body on the calendar day of February 3, 1936. Since that time I have been repeatedly urged by those who are in favor of the proposed legislation to bring it before the Senate. The opponents of the bill have insisted that they have not had a fair hearing; that hasty action was being sought. In view of that insistence, I waited until long after hearings on the Borah-Van Nuys bill, during which hearings the entire subject matter was gone into fully by the subcommittee and by the full Committee on the Judiciary.

It has been apparent to me throughout the session, since the report was made, that those who are opposed to the proposed legislation have done what they have the right to do; namely, encourage delay. They insisted on delay long after the hearings were finished. It seems that it was impracticable to have the hearings printed, for the reason that the witnesses did not promptly correct or revise their statements. It has been several weeks since the hearings on the Borah-Van Nuys bill were closed. It has been several months since the consideration of the bill we are now asking the Senate to take up was completed by the committee; and we are, we hope, within about—about—I said "about"—30 days of the end of the session. "About" may mean 40 days, or it may mean 41 days, as suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt to say that we shall be here until July 4 if the present conditions in the Senate continue.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Illinois is a prophet of evil. He ought not to interrupt my dreams of a 2-day vacation before the political conventions by suggesting that we are to be here until the Fourth of July. Oh, no; the Senator from Illinois is too much of an optimist to bring that pessimistic proposal in here at this time. We all wish to get away. I do not know—I doubt if the Almighty knows—what the Republican convention is going to do; but I should like to have them enjoy a free and full opportunity to do whatever they please. I am satisfied that whatever they do will be wrong [laughter] and that the judgment of the country will reflect that conviction. But, of course, that may be a somewhat partial or prejudiced statement. I mean the statement may originate from a source that some of my colleagues may believe is not wholly unprejudiced. However, if we do not finish before the conventions, we shall be here after the Fourth of July, and that prompts me to ask my brilliant friend, the very efficient whip of the majority, to join his efforts with mine and the efforts of others, including those on the other side of the Chamber, to bring these services to a close as early in the month of June as it is possible to do.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I assure my able leader that I gladly look forward to cooperating in that respect, because, I may be pardoned by the Senator for saying, I am not without some personal interest in matters to transpire shortly. So I should like as much as possible of the summer, during which time I may address the intelligence of the great State of Illinois upon the important questions of the day. But I cannot overlook the fact, I say to my able friend, that we have coming on a tax bill, and I have watched the procedure on previous tax bills in this honorable body, and it is that that fills me with somewhat of a forlorn sense of hope of being away from here before the Fourth of July.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, to my surprise the Senator from Illinois persists in being a pessimist. It is no depreciation of his powers as an orator and public speaker to say that from all the indications of the recent primary it does not matter whether or not he goes back to Illinois to make a campaign. If he could, in fact, get in the Illinois primary twice as many votes as both the Senator from Idaho and the candidate for President from Illinois, Mr. Knox, he ought to be in no haste to get back to make a campaign, for, as is well known, candidates sometimes lose votes while making campaigns. [Laughter.] That has no application, of course, to the Senator from Illinois. It applies to some of the rest of us, but not to him.

Speaking seriously, the question is whether the Senate wishes to consider this bill. If there are objections to its consideration I propose to move to displace the unfinished business and proceed to its consideration, because that is the only way in which the purpose of the Senate can be arrived at.

Now, as to the request that we wait until the hearings on another bill have been published, let me say that I think there has been ample time to have those hearings published. There are hearings already available—hearings by the committees in the House that I described in the beginning of my remarks that no one in this body has read completely unless it be the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. And if we wait until the hearings are printed before taking up the bill they will be used by some of us to find statements in support of the measure and by others to find declarations in opposition to the measure, and no one is going to read those hearings in complete detail.

I know how the Senate tries cases. We try a great many issues here and we avail ourselves of all the information we can secure; but it is not very often that a Senator reads the hearings on even the most important bill that comes before the Senate. He reads the committee report; he refers to the hearings to obtain information on some phase of the subject which is of peculiar interest or concern to him. So, in view of the course the matter has taken, I feel constrained to insist that the Senate pass on the question whether it wishes to proceed with this bill.

There is no desire to make undue haste. It is not expected that the bill will be disposed of today, but if we wait until the tax bill gets here or until the relief bill has come over from the House and is ready to be considered by the Senate, we preclude ourselves from any action on this important subject matter of legislation during the present session; and some outside the Chamber are well informed as to that and are anxious to have us take that course.

It has been said that there is a large number of measures dealing with this subject pending before the two Houses. There are several bills in the House, and I think there are more than two bills in the Senate, and each one of those measures reflects difference of opinion as to some details; but the purpose of this proposed legislation runs through all the bills, and that is to correct the defects in the Clayton Antitrust Act which undertook to prevent by law unfair price discriminations which gave to those who had the power to do so the opportunity to destroy their competitors and to gain a monopoly of the business in which they were interested, to the detriment of both dealers and consumers. Those who are sincerely interested in that purpose may stand on a common ground.

They may differ respecting some details, but if they are earnestly desiring to prevent the building up of monopolies in this country in the trade of the country they may adjust their differences and reach a fair conclusion.

During the course of this debate it will be shown that certain business organizations have been able to buy enormous quantities of articles going into commerce from large producers at prices from 25 to 50 percent less than the sales agents of the seller are able to secure. That means that under the guise of brokerages that were never earned, brokerages charged for services that were never performed, gigantic organizations have driven into ruin and bankruptcy hundreds of small competitors. By reason of the unfair practices implied by the sellers granting a large brokerage fee where no brokerage service was earned large organizations have been able to sell at prices so low that the independent dealer could not continue in business.

All I ask is that this bill be taken up; that the Senate give it fair consideration and send it to the other House, which, as suggested by the Senator from Kentucky and, I think by the Senator from Idaho, is likely to substitute its bill by striking out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and adopting as a single amendment the House proposal. That will throw the whole subject matter into conference and give the conferees the opportunity of reconciling the differences between the two measures. With that in view, I see no objection to incorporating as an amendment the provisions of the Borah-Van Nuys bill, so that if the conferees finally prefer the plan of that bill to either the House bill or the Senate bill—speaking now of the original measures—they will have the opportunity of doing so.

Mr. President, I think I have said all that I care to say on the subject. I will, however, add that I do not expect a vote on the measure this afternoon. I have already indicated that a number of Senators are absent who want to be present when the vote is taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request preferred by the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have not risen to object formally. So far as this side of the Chamber is concerned, the matter will be in charge of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], who is a member of the committee.

I wish to say to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that there is reason why Members on both sides of the Chamber were not ready to go forward today. I did not know until a few moments ago that the hearings before the Judiciary Committee had not been printed. It is rather unusual to bring forward a bill and ask that it be made the unfinished business until after the hearings are printed and opportunity given to every Member of the Senate to study the question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. In just a moment. I find it better sometimes to claim the floor until I have finished a few sentences at least.

I think every bill on the calendar is entitled to consideration sometime on the floor of the Senate. I have never yet attempted, in the capacity which I have occupied on this side of the aisle, to suppress pending legislation or prevent a fair hearing on the floor. On the other hand, I have always maintained that Senators are entitled to a report on a bill and are entitled to have the hearings on the bill printed before it is called on the floor of the Senate for consideration. How can a Senator, whatever his attitude may be, know what the opposition is to a bill unless he has had opportunity to resort to the hearings?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I may state to the Senator from Oregon that there were several bills pending, one in the House and one in the Senate. The House held hearings covering many weeks. Those hearings have been printed for many months and have been available to every Member of Congress. When the Judiciary Committee considered the Robinson bill it used the hearings on the Patman bill because the bills were identical. Since that time the Judiciary Committee of the House has made an altogether different report than did the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. The hearings on the Patman bill have been available at all times. The hearings which have just been held on the Borah-Van Nuys bill contain nothing new that I can find, but I understand they will be available perhaps tomorrow. That is the information I have from the clerk of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. McNARY. I confess a lack of knowledge of the contents of those hearings, but I am told there is a strong dissimilarity between the Patman bill now on the House calendar and the Robinson bill now on the Senate calendar.

Mr. LOGAN. There is a very marked difference now.

Mr. McNARY. I am suggesting that there be no unusual delay, but a delay only of a day or two until the hearings on the Robinson bill can be printed. I refer to the hearings held before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. But may I say to the Senator from Oregon there have been no hearings held on the Robinson bill at any time.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me now?

Mr. McNARY. When I shall have concluded with the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. The hearings which were held recently were on the Borah-Van Nuys bill. The Robinson bill had been reported to the Senate. The hearings, and the only hearings on the Robinson bill, were those held by the House committee on the Patman bill and used by the Senate committee. The two bills then were identical. Since that time the House Judiciary Committee has made a report in which it adopted in principle the Patman bill. It is the hearings on the Borah-Van Nuys bill which have not as yet been printed.

Mr. McNARY. I excused, and I hope I exonerated myself, by stating I did not understand the true situation. No one could, because the matter was brought up unexpectedly and surprisingly a few moments ago.

I understand now from the able Senator from Kentucky that there have been no hearings on the Robinson bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Except those on the House side.

Mr. McNARY. And the Senator says there is a great dissimilarity between the two bills?

Mr. LOGAN. Hearings on the Borah-Van Nuys bill have not as yet been printed. They would have been printed, but because some of the witnesses took some time to correct their evidence a delay occurred. Only yesterday were the hearings completed and ready for printing. Then one of the chief witnesses said that some of the pages of his testimony had been transposed in the printing and asked for a reprinting of the whole thing. I told the clerk of the Judiciary Committee I did not think that was justified.

What I propose to do individually, though I have no interest in the bill further than has the Senator from Oregon, is to ask, as soon as I can, which will be done even if we take up the bill now, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], and the other members of the subcommittee to get together so that we may go over and analyze that evidence. If they are ready to do so, I shall be glad to have that meeting in the morning.

Mr. McNARY. Then I understand the true situation to be that hearings were held in the House on the so-called Patman bill; that that bill is wholly dissimilar to the Robinson bill, upon which no hearings were held.

Mr. ROBINSON. No, Mr. President, it is identical. The two bills are identical. The House, however, amended the bill introduced in the House just as the Senate Committee on the Judiciary amended the bill introduced by myself in the Senate. Hearings were had in the House on a bill identical with the one introduced in the Senate and considered by the Senate committee. Of course, the Senate committee did not resort to the foolish practice of having the same witnesses who were heard before the House committee come here and testify before the Senate committee when the hearings before the House committee were available for use of the Senate committee. I tried to point out to the Senator in the beginning, but he would not permit me to do so, that the hearings, for which it is now insisted the Senate shall wait, were on an entirely different bill from the one which we are now asking to have considered.

If the Senator will yield for that purpose, I will resolve the difficulty by asking unanimous consent that when the Senate convenes Thursday next it shall proceed to the consideration of the fair-price bill.

Mr. McNARY. I have not concluded my remarks.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that.

Mr. McNARY. I shall at the proper time defer to the able Senator from Arkansas.

I understand now there have been no hearings on the Robinson bill in the Senate. There were hearings on the Patman bill in the House. There were hearings on the Borah-Van Nuys bill in the Senate which have not as yet been printed. That is the status. I am not objecting to the consideration of the bill by the Senate at the proper time. I do not know why a delay of 2 or 3 days would be to the disadvantage of the Senator from Arkansas or his party or the country. I do not know what legislation is pending at this time that is of very great importance. What is the rush? Today is Tuesday. The immigration bill has gone over until Wednesday. All we are asking is a few days' time for the proper study of the hearings and consideration of the bill before it is brought to the floor of the Senate for debate.

We know the tax bill will not be here for several weeks. I may say at this time if it had not been for the introduction of the tax bill, this session of Congress would have been over at this time. I was told by the leaders of the Democratic Party when the present session commenced that there would be no tax bill. That is when I prophesied, with my usual accuracy, that the session would terminate by the 1st day of May. But this year, as last year and the year before, the mill has never got through grinding, and here today we have confronting us a tax bill. That is the reason why we have not been able to conclude the session by this time. Every Member on this side of the Chamber, including the minority leader, has cooperated to shorten the present session of Congress. All we have left beyond the tax bill is the so-called relief bill. Hearings have been had on that, but even now the form and fashion of that measure have not been presented to the House. When it will come here no one knows.

Mr. President, I repeat I am only seeking at this time that those in the Senate who have not had an opportunity to prepare themselves to consider the measure and read the hearings shall have opportuinty to do so, and that the bill shall not be taken up until proper preparation is had. I repeat to the Senator from Arkansas that there is no measure pressing that should compel us to rush violently forward. We have ahead of us a tax bill on which we have not as yet had hearings. We have ahead of us a relief bill which is not prepared and ready for consideration.

If the Senator from Arkansas would take the attitude which, I think I may say without being unjustly critical, would be an attitude of fairness and give the Members of this body an opportunity to study the measure, I doubt if there would be any objection. Certainly it would not come from me. I am not prepared to discuss the merits of the bill. I will support the measure. I want an opportunity to examine the Borah-Van Nuys bill.

Another surprise came to us today. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] suggested that his bill be accepted as an amendment. It was supported by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]; and a moment ago, very happily, the Senator from Arkansas said probably it would be a wise thing to do to take all the bills to conference and work them out. I should prefer to work them out before a subcommittee. It may be a good idea to go into conference with them; but, Mr. President, the Senator threatens at this hour to bring up a bill that has not been reported by the Judiciary Committee, a bill on the calendar on which the hearings have not been printed. I say it is very unfair at this time to insist upon legislating in this fashion.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President I ask unanimous consent to proceed with the consideration of the bill. I have proposed to make the consent effective on Thursday. The Senator from Oregon rejected that proposal. I now ask unanimous consent to lay aside the unfinished business and proceed with the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, much has been said since I took the floor for the purpose of trying to induce postponement of consideration of this bill rather than to object to it; but I reserved the right to object, and I now reserve that right for the purpose of saying something with respect to the situation of this matter.

It has been implied that there is a purpose to delay this particular proposed legislation on the part of those who are opposed to it. So far as has been developed in the subcommittee, no one can say that anybody is opposed to the enactment of legislation of this character seeking the objectives claimed. It happens that there are before the subcommittee several bills which relate to the same objectives; and the purpose of having the Senator from Kentucky take the chairmanship of the subcommittee was obvious—so that the evidence taken on those bills could be considered with reference to the bill which he had reported—and it was so considered.

I need only call attention to one extract from the proof which has been handed me since this discussion began to show that the claim that the testimony relates only to the Borah-Van Nuys bill is inaccurate. I read from a proofsheet.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not mean to make the statement that the evidence did not relate to anything but the Borah-Van Nuys bill. I said the hearings were on the Borah-Van Nuys bill; but the testimony drifted away, and we allowed it to go into the realm of other measures. The witnesses talked about the Copeland bill, as I said a while ago; the Robinson-Patman bill, the Utterback bill, and any other bill they desired to talk about; but actually it was a hearing on the Borah-Van Nuys bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. I accept that statement. All I intended to accomplish by reading the record was to show that that is exactly what happened. So there is contained in this record important, precise evidence applying to the Robinson-Patman bill.

As to the delay that has occurred, we have a very diligent secretary of the Judiciary Committee. I am confident that he has tried in every way that was consistent with his other duties and obligations to have the testimony printed. He has just informed me that the material cause of delay was the impeachment proceedings which intervened, and which necessitated extra printing. So there is no disposition on the part of anybody, so far as I know, to delay this matter beyond reasonable consideration of an important bill.

As to the request to proceed immediately with the consideration of the bill, I feel impelled to object, and I do object.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3154.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. COUZENS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Chavez	King	Reynolds
Ashurst	Connally	La Follette	Robinson
Austin	Coolidge	Lewis	Russell
Bachman	Copeland	Logan	Schwellenbach

Carey	Keyes	Radcliffe

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3154, the fair-price bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3154) making it unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to discriminate in price or terms of sale between purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, to prohibit the payment of brokerage or commission under certain conditions, to suppress pseudo-advertising allowances, to provide a presumptive measure of damages in certain cases, and to protect the independent merchant, the public whom he serves, and the manufacturer from whom he buys, from exploitation by unfair competitors, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will read the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert:

That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes", approved October 15, 1914, as amended (U. S. C., title 15, sec. 13), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. (a) That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price or terms of sale between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, where either or any of the purchases involved in such discrimination are in commerce, where such commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, and where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition with any person who either grants or receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent differentials in prices as between purchasers depending solely upon whether they purchase for resale to wholesalers, to retailers, or to consumers, or for use in further manufacture; nor differentials which make only due allowance for differences in the cost, other than brokerage, of manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from the differing methods or quantities in which such commodities are to such purchasers sold or delivered: Provided, however, That the Federal Trade Commission may, after due investigation and hearing to all interested parties, fix and establish quantity limits, and revise the same as it finds necessary, as to particular commodities or classes of commodities, where it finds that available purchasers in greater quantities are so few as to render differentials on account thereof unjustly discriminatory or promotive of monopoly in any line of commerce; and the foregoing shall then not be construed to permit differentials based on differences in quantities greater than those so fixed and established: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers in bona fide transactions and not in restraint of trade.

"(b) That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to pay or grant, or to receive or accept, anything of value as a commission, brokerage, or other compensation, or any allowance or discount in lieu thereof, in connection with the sale or purchase of goods, wares, or merchandise, either to the other party to such transaction or to an agent, representative, or other intermediary therein where such intermediary is acting in fact for or in behalf, or is subject to the direct or indirect control, of any party to such transaction other than the person by whom such compensation is so granted or paid.

"(c) That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to pay or contract for the payment of anything of value to or for the benefit of a customer of such person in the course of such commerce as compensation or in consideration for any services or facilities furnished by or through such customer in connection with the processing, handling, sale, or offering for sale of any products or commodities manufactured, sold, or offered for sale by such person, unless—

"(1) Such payment or consideration is offered on proportionally equal terms to all other customers competing in the distribution of such products or commodities; or unless

"(2) The business, identity, or interests of such customers are in no way publicly associated, by name, reference, allusion, proximity, or otherwise, with or in the furnishing of such services or facilities, and the consideration paid therefor does not exceed the fair value of such services or facilities in the localities where furnished.

"(d) For purposes of suit under section 4 of this act, the measure of damages for any violation of this section shall, where the fact of damage is shown, and in the absence of proof of greater damage, be presumed to be the pecuniary amount or equivalent of the prohibited discrimination, payment, or grant involved in such violation; limited, however—

"(1) Under subsections (a) and (b) above, by the volume of plaintiff's business in the goods concerned, and for the period of time concerned, in such violation;

"(2) Under subsection (c) above, to the amount or share, or its pecuniary equivalent, to which plaintiff would have been entitled if the payment concerned in such violation had been made or offered in accordance with paragraph (1) of said subsection (c)."

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the Senate has not as yet voted on the amendment, has it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the amendment has not been voted on.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, as I understand the parliamentary situation, if the amendment of the committee shall be adopted, then the committee bill, as amended, will be subject to amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Any amendment to be offered should be offered before the pending amendment is agreed to, because it is an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to ascertain the parliamentary situation. Must all amendments be offered before the amendment just read is voted upon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Perfecting amendments take precedence, and all amendments must be offered before the amendment just read, which is in the nature of a substitute, is voted upon.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if the amendment as offered be adopted, then there will be only one vote left. All amendments must be offered prior to the acceptance or rejection of the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment being in the nature of a substitute for the whole bill, the Senator has correctly stated the parliamentary situation. All amendments must be offered before the pending amendment is adopted.

Mr. McNARY. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky whether he desires to speak this afternoon, or would he prefer to proceed tomorrow?

Mr. LOGAN. I may say to the Senator that it does not make very much difference to me. I do not propose to take very much time, but I thought that since other Senators desired to speak tomorrow, perhaps I might as well finish what I have to say. I understand the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] will be here only tomorrow, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] has suggested he would like to speak tomorrow, so I thought I might go ahead and explain the bill, as I understand it, in the next 30 or 40 minutes.

Mr. McNARY. I think that is a very wise arrangement. I recall that the Senator from Arkansas stated that it is not his intention to attempt to pass the bill today.

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, no; that would not be fair. Let me say to the Senator from Oregon that all my life I have tried to be fair, and I would not think of trying to take advantage of anyone. I have no interest in the world in the pending bill; I am not concerned about it one way or the other except as a matter of legislation which would affect the public. There has been so much misunderstanding and misinformation floating about that I should like to explain what is in the bill, and if the bill does not mean what I say it means, so far as I am concerned we will make it mean that, if any Senator wants it to mean what I say it means.

Mr. McNARY. I know the Senator is at all times fair, and it is always a pleasure to have him in charge of a bill. I wanted to have the understanding that there would be no vote today on any amendment which might be offered to the pending amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. There should be no vote. While I do not know that I have the authority to control the matter, although the majority leader asked me to look after it and to take charge of it on the floor, I do not think there should be any amendment voted on this afternoon; and there will not be, so far as I have any control of the measure.

Mr. McNARY. I am willing to accept that statement of the Senator, and I know he will conform to it. I have not so much interest in the consideration of the merits of the bill, but I am interested in having it fairly presented on the floor, after opportunity has been given to study the measure, the report, and the hearings. I have presented the matter to the Senator in that spirit, knowing that he will not ask for any vote today on any amendment which may be proposed.

Mr. LOGAN. That is agreeable to me, and, so far as I am concerned, let me say to the Senator from Oregon, the only purpose I have in saying anything is a desire to help Senators understand what the proposed legislation is, so that they may check up on what I say, compare it with the language of the bill, and ascertain for themselves whether I am correctly interpreting the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. For the information of the Senate, I may state that at the proper time the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] and myself will offer as an amendment an additional section to the bill, and the amendment will consist of Senate bill 4171.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, as I started to say a moment ago, before I was interrupted, there is so much misunderstanding about the provisions of the bill that I desire to tell the Senate what is proposed by the measure, and if I make any statement with which any Senator does not agree I ask him to compare what I say with the provisions of the bill and ascertain whether or not I am correct.

There have been floods of telegrams, briefs, and letters going out over the country supposedly relating to the pending bill, but an examination of nearly all of them has convinced me that the attacks which are made on the bill are aimed at imaginary provisions of the bill, provisions which do not exist. I do not mean to say to anyone that there may not be a necessity for amending the language of the bill in some particulars, but it is satisfactory to me as written.

For the further information of those who are interested let me say that in the House of Representatives, if I may refer to it, there are several bills pending. The one finally reported by the Committee on the Judiciary in the House is not satisfactory to me, and it is very different from the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to the Senate.

In the Senate we have what is known as the Copeland bill, satisfactory to some of those who favor such legislation; the Borah-Van Nuys bill, which satisfies some who favor this legislation, and the Utterback bill, and I believe one that is called the Mapes bill, all of them seeking to attain or achieve the same end. But those who sponsor the bills disagree as to what is the best method of reaching the proper conclusion.

Many of the telegrams and letters Senators have received make no distinction, and they attack the Robinson-Patman bill, they say, because it is called the Robinson-Patman bill in the press. There is no such thing existing now as the Robinson-Patman bill. The two bills were identical, one introduced in the House, and one in the Senate. Later the Senate committee amended the Robinson bill in many particulars. The House Judiciary Committee, at the conclusion of its consideration of the question, added many amendments, and may have substituted a different bill for the Patman bill. So it is necessary to know exactly what is in the Robinson bill, now before the Senate for consideration.

I will tell the Senate as best I can what is in the bill. I have no desire but to give correct information, and if I am mistaken about any provision of the bill I shall be deeply grateful to any Senator who will find out the mistake I make.

It was in 1914 that the Congress enacted what has since been known as the Clayton Antitrust Act, or the Clayton amendment. The purpose of that act was to prevent unfair price discrimination. The purpose of the act was to prevent a seller disposing of his goods to one purchaser at one price and to another purchaser, under the same conditions and circumstances, at another price. The Clayton Act was to prevent discriminations in the prices of goods sold to customers.

Let me digress long enough to say that the bill now under consideration has nothing to do with competition between or among sellers. If one concern desires to sell to its customers at one price, and another concern handling the same line of commodities desires to sell to its customers at another price, there is not a thing in the Robinson bill that would interfere with that. The bill relates to the sale of goods by a seller to his own customers, and the Clayton Act originally related to that particular situation. The Clayton Act, however, contained a provision that there might be a discrimination in price based upon cost of manufacture, cost of transportation, and quantity sold. That sounded very well.

Then there was another provision in the Clayton Act which was fatal, namely, that price discrimination might be made in order to meet competition. That is where the chief defect in the Clayton Act is to be found. For instance, a seller has a customer, we will say, in Louisville, Ky., and he has a customer in Detroit, Mich. They are both in the same class or group of purchasers. Cost of transportation, cost of manufacture, and the quantity involved are all the same. The Clayton Act allows the seller to sell to the concern in Louisville at a lower price than that at which he sells to the concern in Detroit, provided the seller's competitor in the same line is selling to customers in Louisville at a price making it necessary for the seller to cut prices in Louisville, while it is not necessary to cut prices in Detroit. The old Clayton Act, however, prohibited discrimination in prices except when based upon cost of production, cost of transportation, and quantity. Let us bear that in mind and see what change it is proposed to make by the provisions of the Robinson bill.

It was found by experience that those who were able to employ good lawyers could evade the provisions of the Clayton Act and could bring about unfair price discrimination, and that was done in several ways. The Robinson bill, which we are now considering, deals only with three of those methods of evading the Clayton Act, because there are other methods and ways of evading the Clayton Act which perhaps cannot be reached by Congress. We can reach only those things that relate to interstate commerce or have a direct bearing upon interstate commerce. The practice of using loss leaders, for instance, by a store in Kentucky or by a store in Arizona, could not perhaps be reached by an act of Congress.

The Clayton Act prohibited price discrimination. Let me say for purposes of brevity that under its provisions, where the purchasers were in the same group purchasing the same quantity, conditions all being the same, the seller could make no discrimination. He was, however, allowed to make discrimination based on cost, including overhead, distribution, transportation, and all that.

Discrimination might be made, but one might go no further than was justified by the cost and quantities sold.

How did some of them find ways to evade that provision? I said "some of them." I do not refer to chain stores. The bill under consideration has been designated an anti-chain-store bill. It is nothing of the kind. It treats everyone alike. All who sell and all who buy from the same seller alike are placed in the same class. Therefore, it is of the utmost importance that the provisions of the bill be entirely fair, that the provisions of the bill do no harm to any group, sellers or buyers. The only thing the bill seeks to do is to make them be fair with each other. I may say to those listening to me that I realize that we may never be able to put into effect here on earth the Golden Rule as announced by the Christ. We may never be able to make men live according to the Golden Rule, but I believe no one should be blamed or condemned for trying to bring about the desired condition.

I shall now speak of the matter of brokerage. Let me say in the beginning that the bill does not affect legitimate brokerage either directly or indirectly. Where the broker renders service to the buyer or to the seller the bill does not prohibit the payment of brokerage. It is not aimed at the legitimate practice of brokerage, because brokerage is necessary. The broker has a field all his own and he should not be interfered with. In order to evade the provisions of the Clayton Act, however, it was found that while direct price discrimination could not be indulged in, the buyer, if he were sufficiently powerful, could designate someone and say, "That is my broker." Perhaps it was a clerk in his office. Perhaps it was a manager of a store. Perhaps it was a subsidiary corporation organized for the purpose. However, the buyer would say to the seller, "You must sell through that man, and you must pay him a certain percentage or amount of brokerage"; and when the so-called broker or dummy broker received what was paid him, he turned it over to the buyer, and in that way a price discrimination was brought about.

I undertake to say in this august body that there is not a Member of the Senate, there is not a Member of the House, who will not at once condemn a practice of that kind, which provides secret rebates under the guise of brokerage. A very important case was heard by the Federal Trade Commission recently, wherein the rebate, the brokerage, or whatever one may wish to call it, amounted almost to 40 percent, and one concern had been enabled to purchase automobile tires at an average of 40 percent less than independents could purchase tires throughout the country. What was the result of that practice? The independent dealers in the small towns and in some of the larger towns could not meet such competition as that; their businesses were destroyed; and there are wrecks of such businesses all over the country, growing out of that particular practice.

Do not tell me that any manufacturer willingly and gladly gives such tremendous sums to the purchaser. He is coerced into it by the fact that the purchasing power has become so great that the seller is afraid to antagonize it. He must yield to any demand that may be made by the great purchaser, and, if he does so, the purchaser gets an advantage so to build up his business and carry it on that monopoly must eventually result.

The first thing which the Robinson bill does—and it represents about one-third of the bill—is to provide that no buyer shall engage in this trick brokerage practice whereby a rebate may be made by the seller. Under the provisions of the bill no payment may be made to a man acting as a broker unless he actually is a broker. Is there anyone in the whole country, from one end of the Nation to the other, who will not heartily approve of the provisions of the bill aimed at fraudulent practices like that which tend toward the destruction of the small man and also tend toward the destruction of the seller himself in many instances? Should not such practices be prevented if we can prevent them? That is the first thing in the bill.

What else is there in the bill? One practice which has been indulged in to evade the provisions of the Clayton Act is for the seller to make certain service allowances to the purchaser. They may be called advertising allowances. When the purchaser had great purchasing power he could demand that great concessions be made to him; but here was the Clayton Act, which said, "You cannot make discriminations in prices." So there was devised a second scheme under which the seller said, "We will make you an advertising allowance or a service allowance which will bring about a discrimination in prices." That practice has been indulged in to such an enormous extent that I should hesitate to give Senators the facts, even if I had them available this afternoon, which I do not.

The Robinson bill does not say that an allowance may not be made for advertising services. Legitimate allowances for advertising and matters of that nature may be made, but allowances must not be made for the purpose of giving the purchaser an opportunity to buy goods at a lower price than others similarly situated may buy them. It is provided in the Robinson bill that money allowed for advertising purposes must be used to advertise the goods of the seller and not the purchaser's goods, except those which he secured from the seller. How does it work? What has been the result?

One man, who has a good business, demands a large advertising allowance. He does not use it to advertise the goods of the seller; he does not use it to service the seller's products; but he uses it to advertise his business in all lines—in the newspapers, by handbills, and by personal solicitation. One man gets that advantage while another man does not get it. Thus the one who gets that advantage shifts the advertising of his own business over to the seller, while the other man cannot do so; and consequently it amounts to a discrimination in price. The Robinson bill—that is Senate bill 3154—which the Senate now has under consideration, provides that the allowance for services or for advertising must be used for that purpose legitimately and cannot be used as an instrument of price discrimination.

I believe I may safely say that there is no businessman, there is no legislator in the Congress, there is no one who has ever given thought to the matter at all who will not heartily agree that fraudulent advertising allowances made for the purpose of bringing about price discrimination should be prohibited. That is the second thing the Robinson bill does. I am merely telling the Senators what the bill proposes to do. If Senators disagree with me let them read the bill. It is short; it can be read in 10 minutes. Do not listen to the voice of those who are opposed to such legislation; do not listen to the arguments of expert lawyers and skilled research workers who attempt to deceive you; read the bill and exercise your own judgment.

Now, I have pointed out two things. There is another that may bring about some confusion, although it ought not to do so. There is nothing in the bill to prevent quantity discounts. They are allowed; they have to be allowed; they cannot be prohibited. It is well recognized that if one merchant buys a hundred thousand pairs of shoes he should receive a more generous discount than the merchant who only buys a thousand pairs. I mean by that that the discrimination or differential or price must be based upon the cost of handling the transaction, the cost of distribution, the cost of manufacture, the cost of overhead, the cost of transportation, and, yes, even the cost of brokerage. All those things may be taken into consideration, and in the quantity discount necessarily a man who buys a large quantity would get a larger discount. Nobody proposes to interfere with that; nobody objects to it; it is one of the laws of business; that must be so. But there may come such a condition after a while that that purchaser becomes so enormously large, his purchasing power is so tremendous, the quantity he buys may become so very great that the discount which he receives will enable him to drive all others out of business.

That ought not to be allowed; that brings monopoly; for if a man has such purchasing power that he can purchase $10,000,000 worth of goods or a hundred million dollars' worth of goods, he can force his own terms on the manufacturer and the seller and can crush out of existence all the independents, all the smaller organizations; yes, and all the big organizations.

So under the Robinson bill there may be quantity discounts, just as under the Clayton Act; but the Robinson bill goes further and provides that in cases where there are so few purchasers of large quantities that one of them or a few of them may completely dominate and control the entire industry, then the Federal Trade Commission shall have the power to make an investigation and fix quantity limits as affecting prices.

Let me say to the Senate that there have been suggestions all over the country that this is a price-fixing bill. It has no relationship in the world to price fixing, and there is no man who can read and who can understand the simplest language who can reach the conclusion that the Robinson bill tends in any way to bring about price fixing. It does not do that.

There is one other feature of the bill, and just one other—and I think it is absolutely right—and that has to do with the measure of damage.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LOGAN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MURPHY. In the matter of discounts, to which the Senator has referred, in the case of the purchaser of a smaller quantity of shoes as related to the purchaser of a larger quantity of shoes, am I to understand from the Senator that the larger purchaser could have a discount of 5 percent on his purchase of shoes and the smaller purchaser have a discount of 2 percent?

Mr. LOGAN. My judgment is, I may say to the Senator from Iowa, that it will work out in that way. I do not say that that is right, but I do not know whether it can be prohibited, though the discount cannot be a greater percentage than the difference in the cost. If one merchant buys a thousand pairs of shoes and another merchant buys a hundred thousand pairs, the cost of manufacturing them would be the same; the cost of overhead might be the same; but the cost of transportation, of storage, of bookkeeping, and other items of that kind would be no greater, perhaps, on a hundred thousand pairs of shoes than on a thousand, and so there would, I think, legitimately be a distinction, and the larger purchaser would be entitled to receive a greater discount. For that reason—and I thank the Senator for mentioning that point—it is necessary to say that at some point the Federal Trade Commission shall step in and say, "You cannot go any further with those quantity discounts; you can make the discount, if you want to, but treat all alike, and when you get to a certain point you cannot go on and make a difference even based upon the cost." That is the Robinson bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to his colleague?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BARKLEY. For many years there has been a very acute controversy among business people as to whether there ought to be a law passed that would permit the manufacturer of an article, especially a well-advertised and trademarked article, to fix the price at which any merchant located anywhere in the country would be permitted to sell that article, regardless of his expenses, regardless of his location, regardless of all the circumstances under which he does business. The Senator will recall that the Supreme Court held that that sort of practice was against public policy, and therefore void; and since that decision certain groups of business men and organizations have sought to bring about the enactment of legislation which would prevent any discount at all or any cutting of prices or any lowering of prices or prevent even seasonal sales at a reduced price without the consent of the manufacturer of the article involved. So, under some of the old bills, which were introduced 15 or 20 years ago and which have been reintroduced from time to time with some modifications, the seller of Stetson hats, or of Hickey-Freeman clothes, or of Kuppenheimer clothes, or any brand of shoes, the price of which is supposed to be fixed by the manufacturer and which are sold at the same price all over the country, would not be able to sell for a lower price unless the manufacturer himself consented to it. That leads to these questions with respect to this bill: While it permits discounts, depending upon the quantity of the articles bought, which is a well-recognized business practice and has been, I suppose, for a century or more, what effect will that have upon the price paid by the consumer for the article upon which there has been a reduction in price due to quantity purchases by the merchant? Will that reduction be passed on to the consumer so that he will get the benefit of it, or will the organization or the concern that is able to get a large quantity at a smaller unit price reap the advantage to its own profits from that reduction? Will the public reap any advantage from it?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think the public will reap much advantage, I may say to my colleague, because human nature is such that ordinarily a man engaged in business is not going to pass anything on to the consumer when he can keep it himself. It may be possible that the consumer will receive some benefit. I have heard recently, as I have been around over the country a little, much said about increasing the cost to the consumer, and great organizations with purchasing power almost undreamed of are very much exercised now as to what this bill will do to the poor consumer. I wish to speak about the effect which, in my judgment, it will have upon the consumer.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator will yield for one further question before he does that——

Mr. LOGAN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let us take in any city or town two merchants; one of them is a small merchant with a little store, and he sells a certain brand of shoes, or clothing, or hats, or underwear, or whatever it is. By reason of the small purchases he makes—although he may make them frequently, and they might, over a long period, amount to as much in the aggregate as the purchases made less frequently but in larger quantities by his competitor in the same community—the small merchant, because of the size of his business as compared to that of the larger merchant, pays a larger unit price for the article which is sold by both of them. Of course, I can understand that if neither of them can undersell the other, and they both have to sell articles at the same price, the public is not injured, because they pay the same whichever store they go to; but what will be the effect on the small merchant? In view of the fact that he has to pay for what he buys a larger unit price than is paid by his larger competitor, who is able to obtain the goods at a smaller unit price because he can buy more at one time, how will that operate as between the two merchants in the way of competition?

Mr. LOGAN. I will say very frankly to my colleague that there is no way by legislation to afford protection to the less fortunate or less efficient merchant under a condition such as that.

We may go as far as we can to protect him, but if there be one merchant who is efficient, who saves by discounting his bills, and desires to use that saving by passing it on to the public, the man who cannot secure such advantages is apt to go under sooner or later, and we cannot help him by law.

This bill attempts to bring about fair treatment among those who are in the same condition. We cannot prevent efficiency; we cannot stop progress. Those who are efficient, those who are good businessmen, those who are skillful in their business are not restrained in any way. That is true even of the large seller and of the manufacturer. Everything that he can save through his efficiency he can use in making discounts to those to whom he sells under the provisions of this bill, and when he does that he will get an advantage over those who cannot manufacture so cheaply as he does. However, that is an advantage which is natural and to which he is entitled, and we cannot take it away from him by law.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to his colleague?

Mr. LOGAN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If any merchant in a city or elsewhere, who is able by reason of quantity purchases to get a lower unit price for what he buys, desires to pass that advantage on to the public by a reduction in the price which he charges the public, will he be prevented from doing so by anything contained in this bill?

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, no; not at all. It does not interfere with anything of that kind.

There is another point I wish to discuss and then I shall be glad to answer any questions I can, though there may be some I cannot answer. There are only three or four points in the Robinson bill. First, it prevents fraudulent discrimination. Second, it prohibits advertising that brings about discrimination in prices. Third, it attempts to regulate or fix limits on which quantity discounts may be made, so one may go to a certain point, but cannot go any further.

There is only one other point in the bill. I believe under the Clayton Act there is a penalty for a violation of the law. A concern may be fined, or, perhaps, someone may be put in jail. I am not sure there is not a double penalty. That does not help the man who is hurt. There are two parties in interest—the public generally and the individual.

The Robinson bill fixes a presumptive measure of damages in that if a man shall be damaged by one who violates the provisions of the law, he is allowed to go into a civil court and file his suit, saying, "Mr. A damaged me by violating the law and the damage is the difference between the price at which I could have bought my goods if he had not violated the law and the price which I was compelled to pay." I believe an accumulation of purchases from time to time is allowed.

It seems to me that is infinitely better than merely fining the man who violates the law. I think it will bring about a better enforcement of the law. It is not unusual, in statutes such as this, to allow a suit for damages.

Now, let us see what else may be in the bill. What is the purpose of the bill after all? The things I have mentioned are necessary. They constitute all there is in the bill. We cannot find anything else there except by reading something into the language that is not there.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. MURPHY. All Senators, I presume—and I know it is true of myself—have received a great many letters from retail merchants endorsing the Patman bill.

Reverting again to the question of quantity discounts, let us assume that a chain store buys 100,000 cases of a breakfast food and the unit cost of each package of that breakfast food after discount to the chain stores is 6 cents. Let us assume that a retail merchant doing his own buying has a unit cost of 8 cents per package. A chain store would be able in competing with the independent merchant and having a unit cost of only 6 cents per package to offer the package at a lower price to the trade than would the independent merchant. The bill is so drawn that quantity discounts could be taken advantage of, provided the seller and purchaser did not exceed the limitation as to discounts fixed by the Federal Trade Commission. Is not that true?

Mr. LOGAN. That is correct. The Senator has pointed out very carefully, as he always does, one of the important purposes of the bill.

The cost to the consumers, it is said, will be increased. In some instances, perhaps it may, to be perfectly fair about it, but not much. Let us consider it in this way for a moment. Let us turn it over and look at it. Probably the largest percentage of the total goods under the measure we are discussing sold to the consumer by the large chain stores, we will say, is 20 percent. Some say 18, some say 13, some say less, but no estimate exceeds 20 percent. If that be true, 80 percent of this type of goods is sold to the consumer by the independents. If we can enact a law that will give to the independent, the retail merchant, equal treatment with the large purchasers he will be enabled to reduce his price to the consumer. It appears to me that the reasoning is that perhaps 80 percent of the consuming public would be benefited and 20 percent probably hurt a little, but I do not know that to be true.

I do know that we are short-sighted people—statesmen, businessmen—but I believe businessmen constitute perhaps the most short-sighted group in the civilization which goes to make up the entire world. They will not look ahead. They are blinded by their own interest. They live in a false atmosphere until eventually they really reach the conclusion that if anyone says anything about their business he is an enemy and something ought to be done about it.

When a complete monopoly shall have been created, which will come eventually if these tendencies are not checked, we will still have our big business, and then probably those who will have absolute control of the distribution of the necessaries of life will have a great time. "When we have squeezed out the independents, the corner druggists, the corner grocery stores, and they are all gone, then we can reach out and take what we please from the people."

That would be a terrible thing for the people if it should happen. It is better to endure a little increase, or even a large increase in prices, than to have it happen in 25 or 30 or 40 or 50 or 100 years from now, that a few people shall have absolutely gained control of the manufacture and distribution and sale of all the necessaries of life. Such a condition must be prevented. Can we not likewise say that if that day should come, the people would not stand for it, but would rise up and destroy those who treat them in any such way? That is where we are short-sighted. We dare not look far enough ahead. Is it not patent to all that if 10 years ago, we will say, 8 percent of the necessary things of life were held by large groups of large purchasing power, and that every year that percentage has increased until now it is 20 percent, it will continue with accelerated force year after year until the small dealer will be gone, and then everything will be in the grasp of a few? That ought not to be allowed to happen; and when we look at the matter in that light, the little objections which are made to legislation of this character sink into insignificance.

Here is another remarkable thing in connection with the proposed legislation: To show how able some men are, and how easy it is for selfishness to control, there are rival groups favoring this particular legislation. Some desire the Borah-Van Nuys bill; some desire the Utterback bill; some wish to have the Patman bill, now in the House; some the Robinson bill; and some the Copeland bill. Every one of those groups says that the three or four major objectives I have mentioned should be accomplished. But there are rivalries, little jealousies, among them; and the men who are really opposed to all legislation of that kind urge first one and then another. They have a hearing before this committee, and a hearing before that committee, and they argue the matter among each other, until the spectacle now is presented that the persons who are really opposed to the bill abandoned the field years ago because those who favored it were disagreeing among themselves and fighting among themselves.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HATCH. Is it not true, as the Senator has just pointed out about the different groups, that the various bills he has mentioned are all designed to, and do, strike at the same general evil?

Mr. LOGAN. Absolutely; but the difficulty is that when we get among experts and trained men who have been studying the same subject for years they become mouse trackers; that is, they begin to look at the little things, and the little things look large. You know there are men in the world who, if they were out hunting elephants, and while following a big elephant track came to a place where a mouse had run across the track, would leave the elephant track and take right after the mouse track. [Laughter.]

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VAN NUYS. I am afraid the Senator from Kentucky has left the wrong impression with the Members of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope not. If I have, I will correct it.

Mr. VAN NUYS. I think the Senator from Kentucky will agree that the authors of the different bills are not fighting each other and contending with each other, but that that is being done by groups outside the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that I mean to say the authors of the bills are all in harmony; and I do not think I have ever seen a more surprised group than the gentlemen who appeared before the subcommittee of the Committee on Finance at the hearings on the Borah-Van Nuys bill. They thought they had the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Indiana lined up in opposition to the Robinson bill; and when they said something about it, and the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Indiana said, "Oh, no; we are not against the Robinson bill at all, and we do not wish to have it understood that we are sponsoring this bill in preference to the other bills", some of them, I think, went home. They had come down there to help the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Indiana, and they did not think they needed any help; they were on the wrong side.

So, I do not mean to say there is any disagreement among those sponsoring the proposed legislation. I would just as soon support one of the bills as another. There is not very much difference in them, except that there are some provisions in some of the bills which I think would be ruinous; but they could easily be eliminated.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I should like to say to the Senator, that the only objections I have recognized as having any merit came from those who are engaged in the production or distribution of perishable commodities. Because of the language of the first sentence of section 2 (a) of the amendment, there is fear upon the part of those who produce or sell perishable commodities that they will be left in this position:

A man is running a produce store. He goes along until 4 o'clock in the afternoon. He has sold to his customers at a certain price. He realizes that he has to dispose of all the perishables that afternoon, so he reduces his price; and it is feared that that will be forbidden by the bill.

I believe, from carefully reading the bill, that there is no legitimate basis for that fear. I have proposed an amendment, which I understand the Senator is perfectly willing to accept, taking care of recognized changes in market prices; but in view of the fact that the bill, if passed, must be administered, and there will be an interpretation by those who administer it, and possibly a judicial interpretation, I think we should have a legislative record by the Senator from Kentucky on that precise point. I shall appreciate it, therefore, if he will discuss that phase of the matter.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very thankful to the Senator from Washington. I do not think there is anything in the Robinson bill which would prevent a man selling perishable goods at different prices on the same day as a result of different conditions arising, and I think the bill allows that; but let me say to the Senator from Washington that where there is doubt about a matter of that kind, and it can be clarified by a little simple language, the time and place to do it is before we get through with the matter. Therefore I shall gladly accept the Senator's suggested amendment, because it cannot do any harm.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, the Senator feels that with that amendment there can be no question about that particular phase of the matter?

Mr. LOGAN. Not a bit; and, in my judgment, there is no question about it without the amendment. I should like to satisfy everyone concerned, however; and when a Senator thinks such an amendment is necessary and I know it does no harm, all my life I have followed the rule that if a certain course satisfies and helps the other fellow and does me no harm, I will let the other fellow have his way.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to his colleague?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was wondering whether the sales of perishable goods where the question of time is involved are not largely retail sales, anyway, and not by persons engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. LOGAN. That is largely true; but there are some sales of which it is not true. We ship strawberries from Bowling Green—the greatest town in the greatest State in the Union, and the best strawberries in the world—to Philadelphia, Boston, and Washington, and that would be interstate commerce.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to get in a word there for Paducah. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. Well, Paducah has been running us a pretty close race in the production of strawberries. If a man receives a carload of strawberries from Kentucky and cannot sell all of them on one day, so he sells part of the crates on the first day, and the next day he sells some more of them, I think that transaction might come under the provisions of the bill; but I know it will be protected when the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] presents his amendment.

Let me say another thing that seems to be important.

It has been suggested that the farm cooperatives, which are selling milk and things of that kind, made some complaint. They were afraid of something or other, and there was some suggested amendment in their behalf that I looked at. I do not know who prepared it or where it came from, but I do believe that insofar as possible this cooperative business should be encouraged. Mention was made a while ago of the quantity limits. If merchants are allowed to organize or other businessmen are allowed to organize or farmers are allowed to organize and then purchase through their combined purchasing power, and they are allowed quantity discounts, it will be a great benefit to them and also will enable the Federal Trade Commission to place the quantities much higher, because there will be much more competition. That is a matter which ought to be taken care of.

Here are two or three other little things, and then I shall have concluded:

I have listened to the objections of men, so much smarter than I am, who know all about this bill and who have analyzed it. There are not any objections worth mentioning except some of a very minor nature.

In the second section of the committee amendment there is a provision that in making discriminations or differentials, or whatever we may choose to call them, all costs other than brokerage shall be allowed; and it has been said that the words "other than brokerage" in that section ought to go out.

I have thought a good deal about that suggestion. I think perhaps legitimate brokerage ought to be allowed as a part of the costs; and I think when the bill was drafted—I did not write the bill—perhaps in the amendment which was inserted by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate we had in mind dummy brokerage, sham brokerage. It may be that something should be done about that. I call it to the attention of the Senate, so that some of the other Senators may consider it.

On the question of advertising allowances, it has been said to me that the bill compels the making of proportionately the same allowance to all persons for advertising and that that will not work. Perhaps that is true in some instances. For instance, it has been said that you have a customer in one town down in Kentucky and there is a good newspaper there. He is a live merchant and you wish to have your goods advertised. You are introducing your goods and you make him a certain allowance, knowing that he will expend the money well, and for the purposes for which it may be expended under the provisions of the bill. Right next to him in another town you have a customer who has no newspaper facilities. He is not a very good merchant and if you allow him the same amount of service allowance for advertising purposes it will be wasted. I can see that side of the matter. It may be that something can be done about that.

Then there is another provision to which objections have been made, and that is that in the consideration of the costs which are to be used as the basis of price differentials which are allowed by the bill, the bill provides that there shall not be taken into consideration the part of a factory or business which is not used by the particular buyer, and that the allowance must be confined to the costs that can be charged up against a particular transaction. That has been suggested.

For instance, it has been said that here is a man who comes to a manufacturer and wishes to purchase a certain specific article of goods; it may be that it is a plow point, or a coulter, or something of like nature; and he says, "Here is what I want. I have my pattern all ready. I have my design; I have everything ready; and I am willing to buy and pay cash."

Those who are against the bill say the manufacturer has his designs prepared, his molds prepared, a lot of things ready, and this man, because he does not use the service, ought not to have charged up to him something which he does not use.

Some of those arguments seem to me rather refined. I am not a merchant and not much of a businessman. About all I know concerning business is that I represented businessmen a long while, and when you represent a sure-enough businessman he is not going to pay you very much; therefore, you are not going to be very much interested in finding out all there is about his business.

There are those three little objections—one about the advertising allowance, to the effect that one could not use it as well as another; another about the supposed man who might die and not use all the facilities because he did not need them; then the question of quantity discounts, a few little things like that.

I am frank to say that, having gone all through it, I can see no harm in the Robinson bill. I can see some good in it. It may be that its language could be improved by amendment. I know pretty well the meaning of language, so far as legislation is concerned, and perhaps I have written more laws than all the rest of the Senators put together, because I used to write a great many of them when I was connected with the government of my State. I have gone over this bill to the best of my ability. The bill is not my work—at least, very little of it is—but whoever framed it did a pretty good job of it.

Sometimes when I have built up what I thought was perfect, when I have drawn language which I thought was appropriate and apt, which seemed to reach the spot exactly, someone has come along and said, "No; it does not mean that", and I could see in a moment that I was wrong.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I desire to ask the Senator whether any consideration was given to the inclusion in the bill of a provision which would make it more effective than it apparently is now. I observe that no special penalty is provided, and apparently the sanctions for the bill are to be found only in the provisions of the Sherman Act and of the Clayton Act. Am I correct in that?

Mr. LOGAN. No penalty is provided, but let me say to the Senator that there is provision for securing judgment against one who violates the provisions of the law and damages another's business. It is the thought of those who are interested in the bill that that would be a much more effective method of enforcing the provisions of the bill than a simple penalty.

If the Senator is engaged in business, let me say, and he is buying goods, and across the street is another merchant in the same business buying the same type of goods, and the Senator finds out after a while that the sellers have been allowing certain discriminations in prices to his opponents he is allowed under the bill to go into court and bring a suit and have the matter determined in a perfectly legal way as to how much he has been damaged.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I observe, if the Senator will permit me, that the bill provides on page 7, line 23, that the measure of damages for the purposes of suit under section 4 of the act shall be as set forth here.

Mr. LOGAN. I think that means that he may recover twice the actual damages perhaps.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was going to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that section 15 of title 15, United States Code, is the section which provides that—

> Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent • • • and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained • • •.

Would that provision apply under the pending bill?

Mr. LOGAN. I think the Senator is right about that, I am frank to say. I did not find that, and I did not see section 15, but there ought to be an amendment to that effect.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. HATCH. Has the Senator given any consideration as yet to the bill commonly referred to as the "Tydings measure"? The reason for my question is that I am wondering whether it would be consistent with the pending bill perhaps to attach the Tydings bill as an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. LOGAN. To what does that bill relate? I have seen so many Tydings bills that I would not like to answer without having some mnemonic word that would indicate what it is. Does the Senator refer to his "loss leader" bill?

Mr. HATCH. Yes.

Mr. LOGAN. The only thing I am afraid of about that is that I doubt whether Congress can legislate very effectively about the "loss leader", because that is something that is usually intrastate, and I do not know whether it can be reached by a congressional act. I do think there ought to be some legislation about it.

Mr. HATCH. Briefly, the Tydings bill provides merely that the Federal Congress recognizes the validity of State statutes regulating that subject. That, in brief, is the Tydings bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not see any objection to it. As I have said, the sooner we can get this proposed legislation passed through the Senate, the better off we will be, I think, because the House has been giving long consideration to the measure now before it. I think it is obvious that the House is going to insist on certain provisions to which I do not believe the Senate would agree. When the matter comes before the House and the House passes the bill, it just seems plain common sense to me that the conference committee ought to have everything before it that could be afforded, so that it could work out an intelligent bill. There will be no trouble, I may say to the Senate, in working out a bill that will be satisfactory to all those who favor the proposed legislation; and nobody could work out anything to the satisfaction of those who oppose it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Someone informed me that there were at least a dozen measures pending before the House and the Senate relating to this very subject. Is that a correct statement?

Mr. LOGAN. I think there are fewer than a dozen, perhaps. In the Senate I know of the Robinson bill; then the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has a separate bill; then the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] has had a separate bill, but those Senators cooperated and introduced a single bill. Then the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has another bill on the subject. There are half a dozen bills on the subject.

Mr. WALSH. I had a long conference and colloquy with Leavitt C. Parsons, publisher of the Apothecary, a retail trade paper of New England, who expressed his views on the pending bill. He is in favor of the pending measure if something better cannot be obtained. He is not antagonistic to it. I wish to quote to the Senator, and I will use Mr. Parsons' own words, just what he said was the problem of the independent retail merchant, and what he thought was the remedy. I read his own statement:

> The independent merchant today has virtually lost the right to set the prices at which his own goods on his own shelf will be sold. This is due to the fact that large corporations, even some with multi-unit outlets, take nationally advertised trade-marked goods that enjoy a ready consumer acceptance and cut the prices on these below the figure at which the small independent merchants, making up several hundred thousand of our middle class in America, can buy the same products wholesale for their own inventory.

Then he adds:

> Other abuses are related abuses.

He says the fundamental abuse is the sale of trade-marked goods. The chain stores cut the prices on these goods of popular demand and get the public coming to their stores and abandoning the independent stores because they sell the popular branded commodities cheaper than the independents can sell them. Does he state the real abuse?

Mr. LOGAN. That is correct. That practice is a very serious one. It is what they call the "loss leader."

Mr. WALSH. He says this bill does not reach that abuse.

Mr. LOGAN. It cannot.

Mr. WALSH. He says it gets at the unrelated abuses, the secondary abuses, many of which the Senator in his able address has pointed out.

I requested Mr. Parsons to let me have his conception of what kind of legislation should be enacted to deal with this subject. He proposes a very brief and simple bill, which I am going to read to the Senator, to which probably the Senator has given consideration, and which may be similar to some bills which are pending before the Committee on the Judiciary. It is as follows:

> Any holder of a registered trade mark may, at his option and upon the payment of a $25 recording fee, file with the Patent Office a complete schedule of minimum prices for each product carrying such trade marks and said schedule, which shall cover the minimum prices at which the trade-marked product can be sold by all wholesalers, jobbers, retailers, or other middlemen that trade usage has established in particular fields of distribution, will be accepted as representing the price level below which sales would injure the reputation or goodwill of the trade-mark holder. Any violation of such minimum price schedule shall be regarded as a violation of the trade mark itself and shall be actionable at law just as any other violation.

There is another section added to this which I will insert in a later statement. I assume the Senator has had this proposal of a trade-mark law brought to his attention, and therefore I should like to have the Senator's views. That is the reason for my interruptions of the Senator's general observation on the pending bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I have not considered that. It sounds somewhat like price fixing. Those of us who advocate the passage of the Robinson bill have been seeking in every way we could to keep away from fixing and regulating prices. The enemies of the bill have sought all over the country to intimate that it is a price-fixing bill, but there is nothing in it even remotely resembling price fixing. Such a construction may be placed upon it by its enemies. The bill points out the evils of price fixing. The reason we did not consider the question referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts is that the practice of selling nationally advertised products for less than cost, for the purpose of inducing customers to come into a particular store, is something that goes on within a State or within a city or a community, and I do not believe we could regulate it by a law enacted by Congress.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has been trying to do something of that kind. I know he is a good lawyer, and he may have given consideration to that particular subject. Frankly, I have not given it the careful consideration it deserves.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky the colloquy on Senate bill 3154 to which I referred be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The colloquy referred to appears at the conclusion of Mr. LOGAN'S remarks.)

Mr. WALSH. I inquire from the Senator what is in the bill that has met with the approval of the independent merchants, and also what suggestion he would offer to obviate the abuses which Mr. Parsons points out as being the real ones.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the bill does not go far enough to remedy all the evils. However, we can go only so far, because the Supreme Court, a great body of great men, has rapped us over the knuckles a few times, saying that we have done something we ought not to have done. I do not like to have courts rap me over the knuckles; consequently, I keep away from the things which I think perhaps are within the province of the States.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. On the subject of matters being within the province of the States, as I mentioned a moment ago, the bill of the Senator from Maryland recognizes that the "loss leader" problem is one for the States and for State legislation, and the most his bill does is to give congressional approval to State statutes.

Mr. LOGAN. I thank the Senator.

Let me say in conclusion, Mr. President, that the interest in this proposed legislation is very widespread. I do not expect to place in the RECORD a large number of telegrams which come to my office every day. The Federal Trade Commission, however, this morning transmitted to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary photostatic copies of many telegrams which have been received by the President of the United States and transmitted to the Commission. At this time I shall not put them in the RECORD, but I will say that most of the States of the Union are represented in those telegrams; and every day we shall find many insisting that something terrible is going to happen if we do not pass this bill before Congress adjourns, while on the other hand we shall find many saying that something terrible will happen if we do pass it at all.

In my deliberate judgment, the bill can do no harm and will accomplish good. It may be that there should be some very simple amendments. I do not know just what they should be. I can only repeat what I said in the beginning—that I am very anxious for the bill to be passed in the best form in which it can be framed. I have no preconceived ideas about it. I am anxious that the purposes sought to be accomplished by the bill shall be carried out, which are that false brokerage as a means of price discrimination must be ended, that fraudulent advertising allowances as a means of price discrimination must be ended, that quantity discounts must be regulated so that the concern of tremendous purchasing power may not drive out of business everyone in the same line as himself simply because his purchasing power is so great that others cannot compete.

That is about all there is to the bill.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. I have listened very carefully to the Senator's remarks, and I am very much interested in his comments. Like other Senators, I have received a large number of telegrams relative to this bill. One idea which seems to be quite prevalent, for the same sentiment is expressed in a number of telegrams, is to the effect that—

The passage of the Patman-Robinson bill prohibiting delivered prices will eliminate Wisconsin manufacturers from distant markets or necessitate factory operations outside the State, either of which means decreased employment in Wisconsin. Therefore, hope you will oppose this unwise legislation.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that I think the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], whose name appears on this bill, has a cause of action in nearly any court against whoever sent that telegram, because there is nothing at all like that in the Robinson bill.

Mr. DUFFY. The reason why I called the telegram to the attention of the Senator from Kentucky was that I could not find in the bill of the Senator from Arkansas anything which remotely suggested such a conclusion as the writer of this telegram has come to, and I thought perhaps I was not reading the language correctly. I should like to have the Senator inform me on the subject.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin is correct. There is nothing in the bill of the nature suggested by the telegram. If Senators who have received similar telegrams and letters will examine them, they will find that 95 percent of the communications deal with imaginary provisions of the bill which are not to be found in it, and that nearly all of the other 5 percent deal with the original provisions of the Clayton Act which have been the law for 22 years.

Mr. President, I think I have exhausted the subject so far as I am concerned. I thank all those who have listened to me. I shall be very glad indeed if I can be of any assistance by answering questions after there shall have been further discussion of the bill. I may say to the majority leader, the Senator from Arkansas, that I said in response to a question by the Senator from Oregon a while ago, as to whether a vote on any of the amendments was expected to be had this afternoon, that so far as I was concerned I did not expect it; that the Senator from Arkansas had left the Chamber for the time being, but that I felt sure he would agree with me. I desire everyone to know what the bill is about, and I desire to have them go to the trouble to find out; and when they do that we can pass the bill in an hour tomorrow without any trouble at all. There is nothing in it about which to disagree.

COLLOQUY ON S. 3154

STATEMENT OF MR. LEAVITT C. PARSONS, PUBLISHER OF THE APOTHECARY, A RETAIL TRADE PAPER OF NEW ENGLAND, EXPRESSING HIS VIEWS ON THE ROBINSON-PATMAN BILL

Senator WALSH. What are the chief abuses the independent druggist claims exist in the retail trade?

Mr. PARSONS. The independent merchant today has virtually lost the right to set the prices at which his own goods on his own shelf will be sold. This is due to the fact that large corporations, even some with multiunit outlets, take nationally advertised trademarked goods that enjoy a ready consumer acceptance and cut the prices on these below the figure at which the small independent merchants, making up several hundred thousand of our middle class in America, can buy the same products wholesale for their own inventory. Other abuses are related abuses. The discriminatory charges that are practiced and which some of the recent bills aimed to correct, such as advertising allowances, special demonstration, and promotion bonuses are all subterfuges to make price cutting possible, and so seek a greater volume from the big distributors at the expense of the small distributor, whose elimination possibly would mean monopoly by the big distributors.

Senator WALSH. Is it your opinion that the pending bill does not go far enough to reach the major abuses?

Mr. PARSONS. My criticism is not on its substance or the phrasing of the bill, but in its fundamental misapplication.

Senator WALSH. Rather than have no legislation, would you favor this measure?

Mr. PARSONS. Quite; but in practice it might be the source of immeasurable new litigation, and in addition it would lead to inspiring new technical evasions, just as the Federal Trade Commission Act and the Clayton Act, which aimed to correct old unfair practices, led, in so doing, to provoking new unfair practices, which to a large extent create the situation today.

Senator WALSH. You claim that the pending bill does meet some of the abuses that the independent retail druggists are suffering from?

Mr. PARSONS. Yes; on paper. But I doubt if it will cure the abuse.

Senator WALSH. In other words, you said one fundamental abuse, namely, the one which you mentioned at the very outset of our colloquy, is not at all recognized, nor is any remedy applied in this measure?

Mr. PARSONS. It is well intentioned, but I feel is misapplied.

Senator WALSH. Just how is it misapplied?

Mr. PARSONS. Because with mass production we introduce into our social organization certain definite new consumer reactions. Mass production involves mass marketing. When we advanced from local manufacturing to national manufacturing we had to appeal to consumers unknown to the manufacturer. The appeal was made by advertising the product and identifying it. That is the essence of trade-mark law and of national advertising. The present abuses relate only to trade-marked goods. There is no hurtful price cutting or unfair discrimination in unbranded, un-trade-marked, and unidentified goods. Heinz's beans, Listerine, or Campbell's soups are virtually unsalable if the labels are removed. The merchant who buys goods actually, philosophically buys only the physical commodity. He does not buy the trade mark. He may act under the presumption that cut prices help the consumer, yet he abuses the trade mark by the unfair practice. He injures the trade mark and its attached goodwill. By cutting prices he generally merely diverts business to his store at the expense of the living wage or legitimate profit that should be received by neighboring merchants. His act breaks down the price stability and so threatens the economic security of the entire community.

Senator WALSH. Why does the present legislation fail to meet this major abuse that you speak of? In other words, where does the present bill go astray?

Mr. PARSONS. Because under the present body of law all commodities are treated alike, and the right of the individual owner to sell his goods at any figure that he selects is an inherent constitutional privilege in the absence of technically restrictive legislation or contracts. By this I mean merely that if merchant A turns his goods over to merchant B, merchant B can sell these at any figure he chooses, even though that may be far below his competitor's replacement cost. In the courts already there have been litigated cases where a merchant for the purpose of selling goods as "loss leaders" has sometimes purchased the same commodities at the retail figure and absorbed the loss under the name of advertising. My contention is that trade-marked goods possess a particular property not enjoyed by goods unbranded and not identifiable by trade mark. This may be described as the inseparability of the price and trade mark because the essence of the value of goodwill, already recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States, is premised in the consumers' acceptance of the company's commodities or services. It is interesting to observe that opinions in recent superior and Supreme Court decisions bases on an examination of commercial evidence rather than legal technicalities have approached this problem face to face like in the recent Doubleday-Macy case in New York. The State superior court walked right up to recognizing price as property and then said, substantially, that though it seemed fair it could not do so in the absence of legislation. Furthermore, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Borden Milk case, involving the constitutionality of a New York State statute, carried further the evidence and argument that admitted trade-marked goods possess a certain consumer advantage over unbranded goods. In this decision the Court justified penalizing the Borden Co. with a minimum of 9 cents a quart as against 8 cents a quart for unbranded, un-trade-marked goods on the theory that the advertising that the Borden Co. had undertaken made this 1-cent differential necessary in order that the sellers of unbranded milk could compete with them on an equal footing. Based on this point of reasoning, I feel that the present legislation misses its major objective. It is trying to cure by generic rules what really is a very simple specific abuse. My suggestion, therefore, is that the answer lies in a simple amendment to the copyright law and to the trade-mark law under which, at the option of a copyright owner or a trade-mark owner, he might file a set schedule of minimum prices, which minimum reflects a price below which sales of his merchandise would injure his reputation or his goodwill.

Senator WALSH. Has such an amendment been proposed?

Mr. PARSONS. To my knowledge no such amendment has been considered heretofore; but, in my opinion, some such amendment as the following would provide the remedy I have suggested.

Suggested bill to cure "loss leaders"

(A) Any holder of a registered trade mark may, at his option and upon the payment of a $25 recording fee, file with the Patent Office a complete schedule of minimum prices for each product carrying such trade marks and said schedule, which shall cover the minimum prices at which the trade-marked product can be sold by all wholesalers, jobbers, retailers, or other middlemen that trade usage has established in particular fields of distribution, will be accepted as representing the price level below which sales would injure the reputation or goodwill of the trade-mark holder. Any violation of such minimum-price schedule shall be regarded as a violation of the trade mark itself and shall be actionable at law just as any other violation.

(B) Any holder of a registered trade mark who, having filed a minimum-price schedule, grants or permits the use of special discounts, advertising allowances, bonuses or special service contributions in cash, merchandise, or in any other form as an inducement to promote the sale of his trade-marked products shall be understood to have changed his prices and must forthwith file with the Patent Office a new schedule incorporating such changes expressed at a prorated money value available to all buyers under penalty that a failure to file such revised schedule within —— days after any such changes are put into effect will stop him from defending his trade mark at law.

Senator WALSH. With whom have you checked this in its implications?

Mr. PARSONS. With marketing experts, economists, lawyers, and some legislators. Further, I have taken it up with some Members of the House and Senate who feel that this offers a simple solution of one of the major abuses which threatens the survival of the great number of independent merchants of America.

Senator WALSH. In addition to the curative properties of this amendment, have you made any estimate as to the revenue it might produce for the Federal Government?

Mr. PARSONS. Yes. It is, of course, difficult to be exact, because this is presented on a permissive basis, but it is fair to assume that considering the tremendous number of accounts in the book, drug, grocery, and dry-goods field which are sold under trade names and most of which are exploited, there should be at least 100,000 registrations and revised schedules per year. This would amount to approximately $2,500,000. Insofar as the function of the Patent Office becomes one merely of filing and acknowledging, all such extra expense would surely be covered several times over and a net contribution made to the general fund.

Senator WALSH. Why do you think this proposed amendment would not be unconstitutional?

Mr. PARSONS. I feel this proposal would meet the constitutional requirements of good legislation for the following reasons: In the first place, it does not create any unreasonable restriction on personal liberty. It merely exercises what is a proper legislative function, namely, a specific definition of the conditions under which business shall be carried on by elaborating slightly a property right already granted trade-mark owners and already adjudicated and established through decisions of the highest court.

In the second place, it is so phrased as to conform with another principle enjoying constitutional approval—I mean the right of contract. Court decisions have granted specific protection to contracts that are not hurtful to the public interest. In the recent Macy case already referred to, the court, as I recall, pointed out that Macy had signed no contract with Doubleday Page, but they might have signed such a contract and thus implied that, had a minimum price contract existed, Macy would have been legally bound by it. The California Supreme Court decision just announced, validated specifically the right of a trade-mark owner to contract with his distributors on minimum resale prices.

The suggestion I have made is consistent with these precedents. It is drawn so as to constitute an open continuing and optional contract which no distributor is under any obligation to accept unless he desires to do business with the customers who wish to purchase that particular trade mark. To offer goods accepts the contract.

Thirdly, no arbitrary price boosting is possible which would penalize the public. I feel that in this case the operation of economic law would be more effective in protecting both consumer and distributor than any man-made legislation. Premising this on the reasoning that the trade mark is an attribute of mass distribution and that volume is essential to maintain profitable mass production, I feel that no manufacturer filing a trade-mark price schedule in the face of competition from other trade-marked products and unbranded products substitutable for his own, can maintain a price schedule that puts his product out of line above the other competitive products, without losing volume, upon which profitable mass production depends.

The proof of the soundness of this theory lies in the reaction of the Listerine and Gillette Razor companies which a couple of years ago found their products at a price disadvantage in a highly competitive market and reduced their list schedules accordingly. Substitution was fast destroying volume.

Senator WALSH. Would it simplify to any degree the work of the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. PARSONS. I feel it would greatly simplify the work and greatly reduce its cost, because the Federal Trade Commission under the proposed new bills is treading unexplored fields and a new body of law must be built up by litigation in which the Government has to pay not only court costs but the costs of investigation. In this case we have made the "loss leader" actually a part of a trade mark, and we have given to it the traditions and a great body of law already in existence which not only simplifies the court procedure but establishes a great field of precedents for immediate guidance.

NATIONAL FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I will be grateful to the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] if he will give me his attention for a few minutes.

Yesterday the Senator from New York, as chairman of the Committee on Commerce, reported to the Senate favorably House bill 8455, which authorizes the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, and for other purposes. In the brief statement which the Senator from New York made in connection with the report on that bill he stated:

I think I may say, in all truth, that it is a well-worked-out and scientific flood-control measure. It does provide for local contributions. It seemed to a majority of the committee that, inasmuch as benefits involving $350,000,000 are provided by the Federal Government, the States and localities benefited should make a contribution of at least $100,000,000, as provided in the bill.

Evidently that statement was given publicity by the press and has resulted in many protests coming from the areas of the country which have been sufferers from recent floods. I should like to read to the Senator one of these protests which I received this morning:

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., April 28.

A committee representing all cities in the Connecticut Valley has been formed to lend all possible help in securing flood control. Since work must be started this summer in order that some measure of protection will be available next spring, it is hoped and urged that the measure now in process of formation will provide for the Federal Government's taking care of the cost of land condemnation as well as the actual construction of the storage dam. Will appreciate any word from you on this matter.

ARTHUR T. MURRAY,
Chairman of the Committee Representing the Cities of the Connecticut Valley.

Mr. President, I infer from that telegram that the press has carried information to the effect that the several States will be expected to make a contribution at least in paying the damages for the taking of land for the construction of flood-control reservoirs. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New York how damages can be assessed for the taking of land for the construction of reservoirs or basins in the States of New Hampshire and Vermont for the purposes of controlling floods in the States of Massachusetts and Connecticut? The construction of reservoirs at or near the source of rivers will not be of any benefit to the States where the rivers rise but will be of immeasurable benefit to localities and States many miles removed from the places where the reservoirs are to be located. I should like to inquire of the Senator, first, how there can be worked out any plan for contributions by the States where rivers such as the Connecticut and the Merrimac pass through more than one State and where the lands which are taken or condemned for the purpose of building reservoirs are in States that get little benefit from the flood-control measures?

Also, I should like to have the Senator explain why it is proposed to inaugurate a new policy and to depart from the old principle of the Federal Government dealing entirely and alone with flood-control projects and paying the expenses therefor. Will the Senator be kind enough to enlighten Senators on these phases of the subject of flood control?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I made a mistake yesterday in that, by request of the Rivers and Harbors Congress, I delivered a radio address over a Nation-wide hook-up on the subject. The Senator from Massachusetts will have a flood of telegrams, and I certainly had my share, demanding that all the cost of this work be borne by the Federal Government.

The Senator has asked a number of questions, and I shall try to answer them, though perhaps not in the same order in which he asked them. One of the questions he asked is how it happens there is a different policy than in the past. There is no different policy. The Senator must not confuse river and harbor matters relating to navigation with flood control. The people living along the Mississippi River have paid thousands of dollars for rights-of-way and for levee foundations and for costs of maintenance. There is no precedent, with one or two possible exceptions. I think the San Gabriel River in California and Lake Okeechobee in Florida may be exceptions. At Lake Okeechobee it could be said that navigation is involved, because it is a large body of water.

Mr. WALSH. Is not this the first time the policy of constructing reservoirs near the sources of rivers has been undertaken?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. In the past, when we have appropriated money for flood control, it has been for the purpose largely of building levees. Is not that the fact?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct. Now I will answer fully the question and use as an illustration a river which is of great interest to the Senator from Massachusetts. I will take the Connecticut River as an illustration. There were great losses incurred on the Connecticut River this year. Does the Senator happen to remember how much they were?

Mr. WALSH. The figures representing several millions were inserted in the RECORD some weeks ago. The losses were in large part in Massachusetts and Connecticut and not in the States of Vermont and New Hampshire, where it is contemplated the dams will be built for the purpose of storing the headwaters in times of flood.

Mr. COPELAND. There was enormous damage.

Mr. WALSH. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. COPELAND. It is proposed to spend $10,000,000 of Federal money to install projects to protect Massachusetts and Connecticut.

Mr. WALSH. I think the Senator told me the amount estimated by the Army Engineers was in excess of $13,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. The total expenses.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Thirteen million dollars, including lands and damages.

Mr. WALSH. That was the report of the Army Engineers.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Federal Government is so generous as to spend $10,000,000 of its money to build these various projects, it strikes me a contribution of $3,000,000 by the States of Massachusetts and Connecticut is a very modest contribution to ask. I have the matter to deal with in my State. In my State it will cost $6,000,000. My State ought to pay it. I would be ashamed of it if it did not pay it.

The Senator wants to know what we are going to do about reservoirs in Vermont and New Hampshire to protect Massachusetts and Connecticut. The bill provides specifically that when the major portion, or 75 percent, of the benefits are outside of the State where the reservoirs are built, there shall be no charge against the State where the reservoirs are built. Regarding the Connecticut River, in order to control it several reservoirs will have to be built in Vermont and several in New Hampshire. There will be no resulting benefit to Vermont and New Hampshire. They will not benefit from the reservoirs at all. The reservoirs will be built there for the benefit of Massachusetts and Connecticut. So the charge will not be made against Vermont and New Hampshire, but it will be made against Massachusetts and Connecticut except so far as those projects improve navigation. The lower part of the Connecticut River is navigable. Under our policy, navigational projects are paid for by the Federal Government, so from the total cost of the projects necessary to protect the Connecticut River Valley will be deducted the cost of the navigational features.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the Senator know that for half a century the dream of making the Connecticut River navigable existed as little more than a dream, though attempts were made to dig ditches around the great falls in that river, some of which extend a distance of 15 miles, until finally the people of New England woke up and decided it was a bad dream, and that there is no proximity of any consideration whatever being given to navigation of the Connecticut River?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, part of the Connecticut River is already navigable as far as Hartford, Conn. What the Senator evidently refers to is efforts made to open up the river to navigation from Hartford north. Is not that correct?

Mr. AUSTIN. That is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I think the Senators who have been asking me questions will agree with me that the term "navigable" is a legal fiction. When I think of the tears we shed here over navigable streams, and realize how they have run from the floor in a stream, I appreciate that ultimately we might claim it is a navigable stream. But whether it is wise or not to attempt to make the Connecticut River navigable is not my job. That is a job for the Army Engineers. There is a navigation feature involved in the matter.

Mr. WALSH. There is always a navigation feature if any part of the river is navigable or if the harbor into which the river empties is navigable, because we have to keep the harbor dredged out to prevent it filling up from any cause. To that extent flood control is associated with navigation, is it not?

Mr. COPELAND. It is. There is no doubt about that, because the debris, the silt, and all these things would interfere with honest-to-goodness navigation; but Senators realize that it is not easy to find a constitutional excuse for spending money for flood control.

Mr. WALSH. I realize that; and I call the attention of Senators to the very able address made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] a few days ago, showing that flood control was linked with navigation, and had to be linked with navigation in order to have a constitutional standing; and he gave several reasons why the two could not be separated.

Mr. COPELAND. I remember very well indeed the address of the Senator from Nebraska, and was so impressed by it that I sent to him to get a copy of the bill which he has in connection with power development.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator spoke of navigation as embracing power development, soil erosion, forest conservation, and, of course, flood control.

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct; and forestation.

One of the interesting little episodes in the Constitutional Convention of 1787 related to this very subject. The members of the Convention were discussing the question of the establishment of post offices, and it was decided that the Congress should have power to establish post offices. Then somebody said "and post roads", because we recall that in that day it took Jefferson 3 days to go on horseback from Monticello to Philadelphia when he took the Declaration of Independence there.

The necessity of carrying the mails through the marshes and morasses and jungles of our early history made it a sensible thing to give power to the Federal Government to establish post roads; and because of that power, which we have enlarged upon in modern ways, we are building highways. We are spending millions, and I think the aggregate now gets even into billions of money for highways; but when this discussion was on in the Constitutional Convention, Dr. Benjamin Franklin proposed to add "and canals."

Canals in those days were, I presume, much like the Florida canal, just little canals; but the other members smote Franklin, hip and thigh, and said, "No! You cannot build canals, because they confer local benefits—not Federal benefits, not national benefits, but purely local benefits." In the great majority of instances these flood-control projects confer local benefits; but we tried hard to get around that objection, and I think Senators may agree that this was somewhat ingenious, if not ingenuous. On page 54 of the bill will be found the following declaration of policy:

It is hereby recognized that destructive floods upon the rivers of the United States, upsetting orderly processes and causing loss of life and property, including the erosion of lands, and impairing and obstructing navigation, highways, railroads, and other channels of commerce between the States, constitute a menace to national welfare; that it is the sense of Congress that flood control on navigable waters or their tributaries is a proper activity of the Federal Government in cooperation with States, their political subdivisions, and localities thereof; that investigations and improvements of rivers and other waterways for flood-control purposes are in the interest of the general welfare; that the Federal Government should improve or participate in the improvement of navigable waters or their tributaries for flood-control purposes if the benefits to whomsoever they may accrue are in excess of the estimated costs, and if the lives and social security of people are otherwise adversely affected.

I read that over the radio yesterday, and the response I got to it was, "You put in everything except the national defense." I suppose that might be put in, because if there were an interference with commerce it might interfere at a critical time with the national defense. But I desire to have Senators bear in mind—and the only reason I am speaking at length now is in the hope that the RECORD may be read by Senators—that in my opinion we shall have no bill if this $100,000,000 for local costs shall be put upon the Federal Government.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Does that mean that that is to be the policy of the administration?

Mr. COPELAND. That is what I mean.

Mr. WALSH. So I assume that the Senator, in incorporating this provision in the bill, has done so because of the fact that it has been suggested that the bill would not meet with the approval of the executive department of the Government unless there were some combination of financial obligations between the States benefited and the Federal Government?

Mr. COPELAND. I have no right to say that I have had any word sent to me from the administration; but I have had a good, broad hint that the addition of that item will defeat the bill. I do not wish to say any more than that, because that is all I can say.

Mr. WALSH. I did not mean to press the Senator; but I was under the impression that the idea of incorporating State assistance and aid in connection with flood control did not originate with the Senator himself or with the members of his committee.

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct. I should like to say for myself, however, that I think that is fair. Why should not the people in Arkansas and Mississippi and Louisiana come up to us and say, "We have paid all this money for our levees and for rights-of-way and for easements and for the relocation of highways; why do you not pay us back?" We have an application from the conservancy district of Ohio, which has spent a great deal of money out of State funds. Its representatives say, "If you are going now to have the Federal Government assume all costs, that money ought to be paid back"; and I think that is perfectly fair.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if the bill passed the other day, which the Senator and I both supported, contains a provision for State payments?

Mr. COPELAND. It contains a provision for local payments.

Mr. WALSH. The bill which was enacted the other day?

Mr. COPELAND. The Overton bill. The only exception to that is that in the case of certain properties which are involved in the floodways, a certain part of the cost is to be borne by the Federal Government; but the communities affected are called upon to do a great deal in the way of local contribution.

Mr. WALSH. Does that bill provide for reservoirs at the source or on the headwaters of the Mississippi River?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; there are some reservoirs there, too.

Mr. WALSH. And are the States lower down the river, which will be beneficiaries of the construction of the reservoirs, to make a contribution to the cost?

Mr. COPELAND. They also are to make a contribution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think the Senator from New York misunderstood the Senator from Massachusetts. The Overton bill, which we passed, does not provide for reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi.

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, no!

Mr. ROBINSON. It does not provide for reservoirs at all.

Mr. COPELAND. No; I misunderstood the Senator's question.

Mr. WALSH. I asked the Senator to learn if that bill is comparable to this measure. It is not, I understand.

Mr. ROBINSON. There are three projects in the Overton bill in which reservoirs are contemplated—two in which reservoirs proper are contemplated, the Yazoo and the St. Francis. Then there is section 5, about which we had much debate here the other day, in which an emergency reservoir is created. In that case the local interests are required to supply all the land, and to defray all the other expenses in connection with procuring easements and rights-of-way, and also to guarantee the Government against any damage by reason of the construction.

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct. That is exactly the same provision we have here.

Mr. WALSH. I can understand that principle where the river or the tributary is confined to one State and to one particular governmental unit, but if the reservoirs are built in Minnesota, for instance, or Wisconsin, or Illinois, or Iowa, I cannot understand why the people of Arkansas or the people of Louisiana should be asked to contribute money because of flood-control benefits resulting.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. First, let me use Pittsburgh as an example.

In order to protect Pittsburgh it is necessary to expend $27,000,000 of Federal money, and we have provided for the expenditure of $33,000,000 of local money. That is the bald statement. As a matter of fact, these benefits are not given alone to Pittsburgh, but they are to be distributed down the river. The same reservoirs which at the headwaters protect Pittsburgh also protect Wheeling, W. Va.; Louisville, Ky.; and Cincinnati, Ohio.

Mr. WALSH. And Indiana and Illinois.

Mr. COPELAND. The benefits fade out farther down the river.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is there a method in the omnibus bill for distributing the cost?

Mr. COPELAND. There is. It is found on page 56.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator either read that or have it inserted in the RECORD for our information?

Mr. COPELAND. I will read it, because the part I desire to read is very brief; and, since we are discussing the matter, for the benefit of the RECORD I read the portion of the bill to which I have referred. On page 56, beginning with line 7, it is provided:

> The Secretary of War shall determine the proportion of the present estimated cost of said lands, easements, and rights-of-way that each State, political subdivision thereof, or responsible local agency should contribute in consideration for the benefits to be received by such agencies: And provided further, That whenever not less than 75 percent of the benefits as estimated by the Secretary of War of any project or useful part thereof accrue to lands and property outside of the State in which said project or part thereof is located, provision (c) of this section shall not apply thereto.

That is the provision for local contribution. While the bill as written seems to indicate that $33,000,000 should be charged against Pittsburgh for cost of lands acquired, reallocation of highways, and removal of a railroad or two, as a matter of fact, when the cost of construction is less than the cost of the land, then there shall be a 50–50 contribution. That is the way it is written. But as regards Pittsburgh, there will be allocated to Pittsburgh its fair share, and so on down the river, so that the benefited States—Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio, and perhaps Indiana and Illinois—shall pay proportionately.

In that case also the Federal Government has a stake, because on the Ohio River there are locks and dams in connection with the navigation of the river. So a couple of million dollars will be charged to the Federal Government for the protection it receives as a result of the removal of the possibility of floods. The Government was at great expense this year. So the ultimate charge against Pittsburgh will probably not exceed $12,000,000.

In the Golden Triangle, the business part of Pittsburgh, the loss this year amounted to $250,000,000. They are so disturbed about it that some of the businessmen are talking of moving their places of business to higher ground. Cannot the city of Pittsburgh find somewhere, $12,000,000 to pay for protection against further damage from floods? I think that is a mighty small contribution in view of the advantages they would secure. Anyway, that is the philosophy of the bill. The Senate can do what it wishes with the matter and go as far as as it desires to go.

Mr. WALSH. What will happen if the States refuse to cooperate? Suppose provision is made for the construction of reservoirs on the Mississippi River and Arkansas says, "I will not pay." Are the States of Louisiana and other States to be prevented from having the benefit of flood control?

Mr. COPELAND. I recognize that that matter is important, and we anticipated it to some extent by providing, in section 4, found on page 56, that the consent of Congress is given to the formation of compacts between States, so that they can, without coming back to Congress, provided they follow strictly the yardstick, form compacts; and I suppose such a Government agency could borrow money, form a conservancy district, and assess the damages, and in that way have time for the payment, by issuing bonds, so that it would not all have to be done in a hurry. We have tried, so far as we could, to make provision for all such matters.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the Senator for answering my question. We will meet to discuss this question later, and I feel certain serious protests against State contributions will be voiced.

Mr. COPELAND. I have no doubt we will.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nomination of Winnifred D. Flaten to be postmaster at Edinburg, N. Dak., in place of I. M. Shuley.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair). The report will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

CHARLES O. GREGORY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Charles O. Gregory, of Illinois, to be Solicitor for the Department of Labor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, Mr. Gregory is named from Illinois. His name has been before a committee, and despite some little matters of protest touching the suggestion that he was not supposed to be experienced personally in matters of labor law, I beg to say that he is highly recommended, has been shown to be thoroughly competent, and I move that his nomination be confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?

The nomination was confirmed.

PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Henry S. Geismer, of Alabama, to be State director of Alabama.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry about the two nominations in the Public Works Administration. It was our original purpose to have the nominations of certain officers passed on by the Committee on Appropriations. May I ask the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], now presiding, whether I am correct in that statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct, and these nominations were passed upon by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask further, in each instance was the nomination approved by the Senators from the given State?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was; and the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations was advised to confer with the Senators from each State where a nomination was made.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask further of the Presiding Officer, in his capacity as a Senator, what would have happened if the Senators from a given State had been in opposition to the appointment of one of these nominees?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination would not have been reported to the Senate until a hearing had been held.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well. I have no comment to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Henry S. Geismer to be State director of Alabama of the Public Works Administration?

The nomination was confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Alexander Allaire, of Arkansas, to be State director of Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Joseph E. Parker, of Montana, to be State administrator for Montana of the Works Progress Administration.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I move that the nomination of Mr. Parker be confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?

The nomination was confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Army.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the nominations in the Army be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations in the Army are confirmed en bloc.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, April 29, 1936, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, APRIL 28, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain, send out Thy light and truth; let them lead us. Bless us with the grace that softens the heart and brings us into accord with the majestic law of Christian brotherhood. Grant, our Father in Heaven, that foolish ambitions and petulant disappointments may take unto themselves wings and fly away. We pray that inspiring and subtle influences may steal into our souls; that suspicion and contempt may droop and die. Gracious Lord, warn and strengthen us against all destructive errors and hold over our impulses a restraining power. Help us, we pray Thee, to make our country richer, brighter, and happier for having passed this way. Withhold not Thy tender mercies from us, O Lord; let Thy loving kindness and Thy truth continually preserve us. Blessed is the man that trusteth in Thee. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ASININE CONTROVERSY IN THE BIG CITY; SOME FEAR STATUE OF LIBERTY COMMUNISTIC; IS RED OF AMERICAN FLAG SUBVERSIVE?

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include certain explanatory data.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, one of the most astonishing and asinine controversies in American history is raging in New York City at this time. It concerns violent objections to a small book, prettily illustrated, of about 14 pages and only about 1,200 words, entitled, "Americanism: What Is It?", published by the Americanism committee, New York County American Legion. The book, for the time, has been suppressed, although a preponderance of opinion seems to oppose such action. A thousand copies of this book were printed as prizes for school children; its release has been withheld; but I offer it for full printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It can now be read by anyone who pleases to do so. I think it will not be found offensive; I should like every man, woman, and child in America to read it. (For full text, see I, Americanism: What is it?)

How such silliness could go on in a great city like New York, I cannot understand. The population of New York City is twice that of the United States of America at the time the Declaration of Independence was signed; education and knowledge have no doubt increased. (See IV, Declaration of Independence.)

As usual, names are being called. The critics say this book is communistic, un-American, radical, socialistic, and other things. Among the reasons given are that it had some red color in it. Red ink seems to be a disease; it will not be long before doctors are called Communists for using mercurochrome.

SHALL THE AMERICAN FLAG BE STRIPPED OF RED?

The front has blue and red in the type and illustrations. I presume that red is some sort of a sinful color—possibly the critics would like to forcibly strip the American flag of one of its colors. Again, there is a picture of a hand holding the torch of liberty—symbolic of historic Americanism—and this is denounced as highly improper for Americans—or at least New Yorkers—to look at. Possibly the population of the city will be harnessed and dressed like the high-school horses now showing in Ringling's circus at Madison Square Garden, with bits in their mouths, heads strapped down, and blinders on their eyes so that no one on some clear day may raise his eyes and steal a peek at the Statue of Liberty.

This is the worst piece of nonsense and idiotic persecution I have heard of in American history. Think of witch burners of the past, the fanatics of all sorts—but a big-city witch burner is worse than the rural fanatic; and there is less excuse.

It is not my pleasure to personally know these critics. They may be leading New Yorkers—impatience might propel me to say that they control the intellectual life of the city. This, however, is not true; the whole thing must be a misunderstanding. Possibly the critics have not thought the matter over; possibly when they saw some red it magnified so that the blue could not be seen. (For full discussion of dangers inherent in red, see V, The 14 points of the red menace.)

Or possibly they are so righteous, so certain of their rectitude, that they really would strip the red stripes out of our flag and change to a solid lily-white background as a symbol of their impeccable purity.

DO NEW YORKERS WANT TO PULL DOWN THE STATUE OF LIBERTY?

There is so much press comment on this I cannot tell whether any New Yorkers are really opposing the publication of this book or not. I say this in justice to my fellow Legionnaires of New York City.

(See, for further press comment, II, Editorials and news comment.)

SUBJECT: NON-SENSE, NON-SENSE, NON-SENSE

In the New York Herald Tribune of today, Tuesday, April 28, 1936, I see where H. L. Chaillaux, director of the American Legion Americanism committee, has sent a letter from Indianapolis to Hon. Joseph V. McCabe, county commander of all Legion posts, in which he states:

On the opening page I note the raised hand and flaming torch with its striking similarity to the left-wing Socialist emblem.

When the American torch of liberty got to be "left-wing" or "socialist" or something un-American, I do not know. Furthermore, a torch, if lighted, obviously flames. Would these objectors extinguish the flames of liberty? All I know is that millions of Americans look forward to seeing the Statue of Liberty. It would be disappointing to have it thrown in the New York Harbor, or for the hand holding the torch to be sawed off.

Then Mr. Chaillaux says:

Am I (apparently as the sole judge of what is Americanism—parentheses are mine) to assume this is merely a coincidence?

Thus, apropos of nothing, he proceeds:

Several drawings in the booklet are strikingly similar to the usual subversive placards.

In this I can see no sense at all, nor any connection with the story. There are, for instance, some very simple wood-cut drawings: One of an ordinary landscape, another showing our pioneer forefathers, another showing the city of New York with an airplane over it, another showing Liberty being crushed, similar to the coat of arms of numerous States, including Virginia, whose motto is "Sic Semper Tyrannis"—"Thus ever to tyrants"—another of a mother holding a little child, and the book ends with the words:

Only by sturdily holding to this struggle for these ideals can we defeat ignorance and tyranny and preserve democracy, justice, and liberty.

LIBERTY OF SPEECH, PRESS, CONSCIENCE, RELIGION ALL LEGALLY SAME

In the letter to Mr. McCabe, Chaillaux continues: "The seventh paragraph in the booklet places, in typical Stalin fashion, freedom of worship in a secondary position." This is simply nonsense, for the freedom of speech, press, religion, conscience, and the right to peaceably assemble are all contained in article I of the amendments to the Constitution, known as the first article of the Bill of Rights. Legally, freedom to speak is also to preach; to peaceably assemble, to go to church; while press includes religious journals as surely as it does any newspaper. This injection of religion in the dispute is apparently to prejudice religious people against their own rights; or else the meaning of the Bill of Rights is misunderstood by Mr. Chaillaux. Besides this, religious freedom is prominently and specifically mentioned, as the text will show.

The letter to Mr. McCabe, of New York City, states that the Legion stands for freedom of speech "up to the point where it was used by a person or group to promote the violent overthrow by force of the Government." This book does not in any way even mention violence except to condemn it severely; it merely says that violence produces "chaos * * * is wasteful * * * stupid." The little book, as a matter of fact, is mildly and pleasantly written and is worthy of true Americanism.

Mr. McCabe and a large majority of New York Legionnaires have acted wisely and courageously in refusing to suppress this little book. They deserve praise and should be encouraged by the American people.

NEW/ YORK AND TEXAS—BOOBS, OR WHAT HAVE YOU, EQUALLY DISTRIBUTED

Mr. Speaker, I am from Texas, which is irrelevant to this story, except that I intend to compare it to New York City, which has almost exactly the population of my State. I have been visiting New York City ever since I arrived there in 1912 on an old Mallory steamship on my way to college. Since that time I have visited New York dozens of times and have lived there long enough to know a little about it. In New York I hear talk about communism, fascism, and many other subjects. I have been told that most of the smart businessmen live in New York City, and practically all the intellectuals. I now have a wide acquaintance in New York City, and I find out that its population is precisely like that of any other portion of the United States. This may be disappointing to some, but it is true. I repeat, there is no difference between the people of New York and Texas. Texas has an area of 265,896 square miles. Greater New York, according to the almanac, has 308.86 square miles, with Manhattan having only approximately 30 square miles; and the only difference I can find between my people and New York people is that in Texas our civilization is spread out flat over a wide area, and that of New York is in a small area and straight up and down. The saints and sinners, the half-wits and the intellectuals, the Communists and the Fascists are about the same. The only difference is that in Texas we have more room to roam around in. There is as much hospitality in New York as there is in the South—and as much meanness, too.

VETERANS SHOULD STAND FOR PRESERVATION OF LIBERTY

I do not believe that I have ever talked about my service in the war before for print, nor have I ever beat myself on the breast very much as a veteran. Today, however, I feel like mentioning the fact that I am a veteran and became a Legionnaire soon after the war and am a member of the Veterans of Foreign Wars and several veterans' organizations. As an ex-soldier of the A. E. F. and a member of these organizations, I must protest against such nonsense as this. The American Legion is a great organization and, above all, should practice the observance of the Constitution and especially the preservation of what is fundamental Americanism, and that is the preservation of liberties as enunciated in the Constitution and Bill of Rights. (For preamble to American Legion constitution, see III, Legion preamble.)

To attack this little book in such an evasive manner, without any real facts, is to adopt a policy of the Fascist and Nazi courts, wherein there are no rules of evidence, and where fair procedure and ordinary justice goes by the board.

It is not for me to advise the Legionnaires of New York. I soldiered with many of them in France, and one, Frank Felbel, was killed by my side in the Argonne Forest while we served with the Twenty-eighth Infantry. I soldiered with many others who now live in the city. The Legionnaires of New York and the ex-soldiers know their business as well as I do. I do not want to intrude. But this concerns America, and I am sure that well-informed citizens and the rank and file of the Legion want to preserve democracy and its principles. For them to ban a little book which reaffirms the Bill of Rights merely because it happens to use red, which is part of the American flag, with blue right beside it, would be so silly as to lose caste and the respect of the thinking American citizens.

This little book—and it is O. K.—is published by the press of the Woolly Whale, of New York, and in form and color it is an excellent job. One thousand special copies were issued for the students of New York City who were awarded Americanism medals by the American Legion of New York County. Cyrus LeRoy Baldridge, of New York, an artist, appears to be the author.

The book says, for instance:

In a democracy citizens are not ruled by force and told by the state what they shall think. Americans, in their struggle for democracy, stand forever opposed to dictatorship by a person or by any special group.

What is objectionable in that? Do the critics believe that we ought to already pay homage to a military dictator?

Again, it says:

Wise men know that the use of violence, producing chaos, is not only a savage but a wasteful, therefore stupid, means of bringing about change. Use of violence breeds more violence. If civilization is to develop, reason must take the place of brute force.

What is it the critics want? What, in the name of common sense? Do they think it criminal for the little book to oppose "the use of violence, producing chaos"? Do they object to the words "Reason must take the place of brute force"?
